"It is very easy to sketch a magnificent scheme of national instruction, beginning with the infant school and terminating in a colossal university, assigning a fixed term of years, &c., corps of teachers and professors to each grade, and drawing on the Treasurer of the United States at the close of the year for twenty or forty millions to cover the expense. And it may be shown, moreover, that such stupendous enterprises have been successful in Holland, in France, and in Prussia. But we must never forget that with them the people depend on the Government, while with us the Government depends on the people. All our ministers of state and of religion combined cannot open a church nor close a grogshop against the will of the people."

Now, there is the judgment of a man who,

I venture to say, is equal to any gentleman here upon this particular subject of education. He has devoted a life-time, or half a century, to it, and I trust the House will give his judgment that weight which I feel it should have.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] if he had examined the substance of this bill, would have seen that it does not propose to teach a single child, white, black, or colored, male or female, its a b c's. It simply proposes that a bureau at an extravagant rate of pay, with an undue number of clerks, shall be established for the purpose of collecting statistics in connection with the education of the children of the country. Now, if any bureau, or any Federal authority over this subject should be established at all, it can be as well done by two clerks, as is proposed by my amendment, and it is a thing which appropriately belongs to the Secretary of the Interior, and should there be placed.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Very well.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would inquire if he knows of any country in the world that has a good system of education that is without a system of gathering statistics of a national character.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Well, sir, they may all have their systems, but they are under a monarchy, and are entirely different from ours. There is no similarity between the school system of Germany and that of this country.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would inquire if the gentleman is perfectly willing to substitute our system for the system of Germany.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Would I?

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would not give the system of Connecticut for all the systems of the rest of the world. I consider that, in that particular, Connecticut has reached the highest point of all, and therefore I do not want to interfere in any manner with her system, nor with that of any State that is approaching to that degree of perfection in education which she has attained, by any act of Federal authority or supervision.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the gentleman if it is not the purpose of this bill to give the knowledge of what Connecticut is doing to all the States through this great channel of information.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Then why not leave it to the States? Why do you want to establish this bureau?

Mr. GRINNELL. For the same reason that we want statistics in reference to agriculture and all other important interests.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not know how it is in all cities, but I know how it is in mine. We have a school superintendent who furnishes every information which is necessary in connection with our Pennsylvania school system, at each session of the Legislature; and all that this bill could possibly do would be just to copy the State superintendent's report and put it on file in the Interior Department.

Mr. THAYER. They do that now.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. My colleague says they do that now. Then they might exchange them all over the country, and scatter the information among the different States through the various State superintendents. But, lest I might be considered as disposed to interfere improperly with the promotion of education, I have offered the substitute which has been read. If a measure of this kind be deemed necessary, why should we not adopt this substitute and try its practical operation for one year? This is not a time, the House will permit me to suggest, for the establishment of any new bureau. Why, sir, we might as well establish a national Bureau of Religion—which God forbid! We might as well establish a Bureau of Temperance, which some gentlemen might advocate as calculated to be of great service. There is just as much necessity for the establishment of a Bureau of Temperance and a Bureau of Religion as there is need for the creation of a Bureau of Education. It appears to me that the bill before us proposes to involve us in an immense expenditure of money for the purpose of erecting a bureau which, so far as I know, we have not been called upon by any authority whatever to create.

Now, sir, I agree with that ancient philosopher who said that "no man goeth about a more godly purpose than he that is mindful of the good bringing up both of his own and other men's children;" but I cannot see that we shall promote in any degree the education of the children of this country by appointing an officer charged with the duty of overseeing the educational systems of the respective States.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I have been induced to offer my substitute as being at least preferable to the proposition of the committee. It appears to me proper that if there is to be established any system for the supervision of education in the various States, this system should be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, to whom is assigned the superintendence of the collection of census statistics, and that this officer shall have authority to appoint two additional clerks to have charge of this particular subject.

Sir, a great deal has been said, and very well said, on the subject of the necessity of having an officer who shall be the directing and supervisory head of educational matters throughout the country; and on this subject I was very much pleased with the eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.] But, sir, to have a head without any body, as is proposed by this bill, would not, it appears to me, be of much utility. Each of the respective States has its own educational system with its own local head, exercising a supervision over these matters within the jurisdiction of the State. Each State makes its own appropriations for the support of its educational system, and it has suitable officers charged with the duty of controlling the expenditure of money for this purpose and of auditing those expenses. Thus in the various States the education of youth is well attended to by the respective State officers.

As regards the education of children in the South, I have not so much knowledge as the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] who has spoken on this subject. But, sir, Congress has established a Freedmen's Bureau, under which school-houses have been built and a system of instruction organized. It seems to me that this system is a very unconstitutional mode of spending the people's money; but since that system has been adopted, and is being carried out at an immense cost to the Government, there surely can be no necessity for establishing another bureau for the same purpose.

The SPEAKER. The fifteen minutes of the gentleman from Pennsylvania have expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] for ten minutes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, the remarks made upon this bill by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] induce me to offer a few words in its behalf. As regards the expense of the organization, it is wise or unwise according to the judgment we may form as to the expediency of the proposition itself. If it be at all wise to establish such a branch of administration in the Government, then of course the expense of thirteen thousand or fifteen thousand or twenty thousand dollars a year is a matter of no considerable consequence.

It is to be observed in reference to this measure that it does not contemplate the exercise of any power whatever over the school organization of any State for the education of any child in the country. So far as we in New England are concerned we do not anticipate any considerable advantage from this measure, and I do not advocate it upon the ground of its advantage to us. The object of this bureau or department, or whatever it may be termed, is not to control by force the school systems of the country. It will exercise no positive power anywhere. But its advantages will be found in the dissemination of information to every part of the country concerning those systems of education which are found to be best in the sections most advanced in the work of popular education. Now, sir, many years ago I happened to find in the city of Chillicothe, Ohio, a high school which was organized and operated advantageously without any teachers whatever—an exceptional case in educational matters, not only with reference to this country but with reference to the whole world. Now, I do not hesitate to say that a knowledge distributed through all this country of the means by which that school was organized, maintained, and made efficient for the purpose of education, would have been worth more than the entire cost of this branch of the public administration.

It is also true that the system of normal school training, without which there can be no efficient system of public instruction, is comparatively unknown to the people of this country. And I think I do not state anything not known when I say that in the city of New York ten years ago, while they had there a normal school, the men who administered that school had failed up to that time to apprehend the principle which lies at the foundation of the system of normal school training.

And in the State of Arkansas—I refer to the matter only in the way of illustration—we enrolled during the late war whole regiments of white soldiers for the Union Army, not one tenth of whom could sign their names to the pay-rolls.

Now, what we desire to do through this branch of the public administration is from this center or this seat of Government to disseminate throughout this whole country, to Massachusetts, Arkansas, Louisiana, South Carolina, and all the States information on the one side in regard to the best means of public instruction, and on the other side the advantages to be derived from a good system of public instruction.

In deciding whether this branch of administration should be established we undoubtedly must first consider whether the subject of education is of such importance that the General Government is justified in gathering and disseminating information concerning it. In that connection I will refer to but a single fact.

More than thirty years ago, in the great contest between Eli Whitney and the State of Georgia, in relation to his right to the invention of the cotton-gin, Chief Justice Marshall said that that invention alone had then saved to the people of this country $500,000,000, and I have no doubt that up to the present time that invention has been worth to the people of this country an amount equal to two thirds of the aggregate expenses of the war through which we have just passed.

Now, that invention is but one of the ten thousand inventions which have been made in this country, all of them more or less valuable, and all due in a great measure to our systems of public instruction. You may go to-day to the Patent Office and ascertain from the number of patents issued, the condition of public information in each and every State of this Union. The inventive power of a people is developed in exact proportion to the extent of their education and enlightenment.

Now, if these be facts—and I only make the general statement for the purpose of illustrating the great truth that the industrial power and productive force of the people of this country are exactly in proportion to the extent of their education—then assuredly it follows that there is no branch of the public administration more worthy of consideration than that of gathering and disseminating information in regard to the public school systems of the various States of this Union.

For these reasons, and for many others which I might adduce if I had time, I have for myself no doubt of the expediency of this measure. It is no invasion of State rights; it does not seek to control anybody; it does not interfere with the system of education anywhere; it only proposes to furnish the means by which from a bureau here every citizen of every State of this Republic can be informed as to the means of education existing and applied in the most advanced sections of this country and of the world. And if this information can be disseminated for $15,000 or $20,000 or $50,000 or $100,000 a year, it is an expenditure which in the course of time will be returned at least one hundred fold in the ability of the people to apply their manual, intellectual, and moral powers to the productive industry and resources of the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] to offer an amendment to this bill.

Mr. GRINNELL. With the consent of the chairman of the select committee, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I rise to offer an amendment to this bill, for I desire that it shall pass. And in connection with my amendment I desire to say that it is to reduce the salary of the Commissioner and the number of clerks. And I would call the attention of the House to the fact that with the amendment I propose this great bugbear of expense will then be about one fiftieth of a cent to each person in the United States; a wonderful proportion of expense for a measure which looks to the diffusion of education throughout the country. I offer the following amendment:

In line five, section two, strike out "five" and insert "four," so it will read: "who shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum;" in line eleven strike out after the word "annum" these words: "one clerk who shall receive a salary of $1,400 per annum; and one clerk who shall receive a salary of $1,200 per annum;" and in line nine, before the word "the" insert the word "and."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me five minutes, to make a personal explanation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. When this subject comes to a final vote, I will now state that I have agreed to pair with the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. STEVENS.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a personal explanation in regard to a slight altercation which took place the other day between me and the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU.] The other day I am reported to have said—and I am not here to say I did not say so—that "all I had to say was, the charge he made was false." I wish to retract that assertion, and to say that I had no intention to make any personal reflection upon the gentleman. I know he is an honorable gentleman, and that he would not do me injustice; and I certainly did not intend to do him injustice, although I believe in the heat and excitement of debate I may have said what I did not intend to say. A man who has been so brave and gallant has no reason to fear that any honorable man will detract anything from him to which he is justly entitled. I know that a brave man, as the gentleman has shown himself to be, is an honorable man, and I hope the explanation I make will be satisfactory to himself and to the House.

I have tried to make it a part of my business during my service in Congress to insult no man. It may be that in the heat and excitement of debate I may use expressions I did not design. I presume I have tried as hard as any one to drown the spirit of jealousy. I know it is a violent passion of the human heart and will sometimes show itself. I hope that in regard to others as well as in regard to the gentleman from Kentucky, if I should make such remarks in the heat of debate, I will be forgiven as I certainly forgive those who have applied such remarks to me.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I desire to say a word. I did not hear the remark to which the gentleman has referred, or I would most certainly have answered it at the time. I of course accept his explanation; but at the same time I must insist that what I said on that occasion, although said with reluctance, was perfectly proper. I should not have said it at all but in the discharge of a high duty which I owe to the volunteers of the United States Army.

Mr. ROGERS. I suppose gentlemen of the House knew well enough, when I was talking about officers of the regular Army, I had no insinuations to make against the volunteers. I consider myself, although I did not agree with all the plans of the war, to have been one of the best friends of the volunteers. In fact I expended more money and raised more troops in my county, with one exception, than any other man. My people know it. No one can show where my vote or influence has been given in any way against the volunteers. I give them as much credit as any gentleman upon this floor for having performed noble and gallant service.

BUREAU OF EDUCATION—AGAIN.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the previous question, which I trust the House will sustain, and I will say after that what I have to say on this subject. I will detain the House but a short time.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did intend to make a somewhat elaborate statement of the reasons why the select committee recommend the passage of this bill; but I know the anxiety that many gentlemen feel to have this debate concluded, and to allow the private bills now on the Calendar to be disposed of, and to complete as soon as possible the work of this session. I will, therefore, abandon my original purpose and restrict myself to a brief statement of a few leading points in the argument, and leave the results with the House. I hope this waiving of a full discussion of the bill will not be construed into a confession that it is inferior in importance to any measure before the House, for I know of none that has a higher or nobler purpose, or one that more nearly affects the future of this nation.

I first ask the House to consider the magnitude of the interests involved in this bill. The very attempt to discover the amount of pecuniary and personal interest we have in our schools shows the necessity of a department such as is proposed in this bill. I have searched in vain for any complete or reliable facts showing the educational condition of the whole country. If we go to the census of 1860 we find that the returns are meager. We really know nothing about the importance and extent of the educational interests of this country. Let me refer to some approximate statistics. By the census of 1860 there appear to have been in the United States 115,224 schools, 150,241 teachers, and 5,500,000 scholars. There were 500,000 school officers, thus making over six millions of the people of the United States directly engaged in the business of education.

Not only has this large proportion of our population been thus engaged, but the Congress of the United States has given fifty-three million acres of public lands to fourteen States and Territories of the Union for the support of schools. In the old Ordinance of 1785 it was provided that one section out of every township of land in the United States should be given for the support of schools. Thus one thirty-sixth of the entire territory of the United States is held forever sacred and set apart for the interests of the schools of the country. In the Ordinance of 1787 it was declared that "religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged."

It is estimated that at least $50,000,000 have been given in the United States by private individuals for the support of schools. We have thus an interest, even pecuniarily considered, hardly second to any other. We have tolerably complete school statistics from only seventeen States of the Union, for, sir, in this country of schools and of education there are but seventeen States that have sent to the Congress-sional Library full reports of their schools. In those seventeen States there are 90,835 schools, 129,000 teachers, 5,107,285 pupils, and $34,000,000 annually appropriated by the Legislatures for the support and maintenance of schools. We find that in those seventeen States during the late war, notwithstanding all the great expenditures entailed upon them, they raised by taxation $34,000,000 in the aggregate for the support of common schools. There are several States in this Union where more than fifty per cent. of all the tax imposed for State purposes is for the support of schools. And yet, with all these facts before us, gentlemen are impatient because we wish to occupy a short time in discussing a question of this magnitude.

Sir, I will not trouble the House by repeating common-places so familiar to every gentleman here, as that our system of government is based upon the intelligence of the people. But I wish to suggest to the House this thought, that there never has been a time in the history of our country when all the educational forces ought to be in such perfect activity as at the present day.

Sir, it is a mistake to say that we have much ignorance in this country. There is little of what is generally called ignorance in the United States. In the Old World, under the despotism of Europe, the masses of ignorant men, mere inert masses, are moved upon and controlled by the intelligent and cultivated aristocracy. But in this Republic, where the Government rests upon the will of the people, every man has an active power for good or evil, and the great question is, will he think rightly or wrongly; shall the power in him be educated and directed aright toward industry, liberty, and patriotism, or, under the baneful influence of false theories and evil influences, shall it lead him continually downward and work out anarchy and ruin both to him and the Government?

The question is not whether our people shall be educated or not. If they are not educated in the school of virtue and integrity they will be educated in the school of vice and iniquity. We are, therefore, afloat on the sweeping current; if we make no effort we go down with it to the saddest of destinies. It is only by perpetual and persistent effort that we make headway and advancement in civilization.

According to the census of 1860 there were 1,200,000 inhabitants in the United States over twenty-one years of age who could not read nor write, and 800,000 of those were American-born citizens. One third of a million of people are being annually thrown upon our shores from the Old World, and the gloomy total has been swelled by the 4,000,000 slaves admitted to citizenship by the events of the war. Such, sir, is the immense force which we must now confront by the genius of our institutions and the light of our civilization. And how shall it be done? An American citizen can give but one answer. We must pour upon them all the light of our public schools. We must make them intelligent, industrious, patriotic citizens or they will drag us and our children down to their level. Does not this question rise to the full height of national importance and demand the best efforts of statesmanship to adjust it?

Horace Mann has well said:

"That legislators and rulers are responsible.

"In our country and in our times no man is worthy the honored name of a statesman who does not include the highest practicable education of the people in all his plans of administration.

"He may have eloquence, he may have a knowledge of all history, diplomacy, jurisprudence, and by these he may claim, in other countries, the elevated rank of a statesman, but unless he speaks, plans, labors at all times and in all places for the culture and edification of the whole people he is not, he cannot be an American statesman."

Gentlemen who have discussed this question this morning tell us that this measure will by and by result in a great expense to the Government. Whether an enterprise is expensive or not is altogether a relative question, and depends wholly upon the importance of the object upon which the money is expended.

Now, what have we done as a nation in the way of expenses? In 1832 we organized a Coast Survey Bureau, and we have expended millions upon it. Its officers have triangulated thousands of miles of our coasts, have made soundings of all our bays and harbors, and have carefully mapped the shoals, breakers, and coast lines from our northern boundary on the Atlantic to the extreme northern boundary on our Pacific coast. They have established eight hundred tidal stations to observe the fluctuations of the tides. We have expended vast sums in order perfectly to know the topography of our coasts, lakes, and rivers, that we might make navigation more safe. What, is it of no consequence that we explore the boundaries of that wonderful intellectual empire which incloses within its dominion the fate of succeeding generations, and of this Republic? The children of to-day will be the architects of our country's destiny in 1900.

We have established an Astronomical Observatory here where the movements of the stars are watched, latitude and longitude calculated, and where chronometers are regulated for the benefit of navigation. For this Observatory you pay one third of a million per annum. Is it of no consequence that you study those stars which shall, in the time to come, be guiding stars in the political firmament?

You have a Light-House Board established, and they are making experiments, by all the aids of science, in the best modes of regulating the beacons upon our shores; they are placing buoys as way-marks to guide ships into our harbors and make our navigation more safe. Will you not have a light-house board that will set up beacons for the coming generation, not as lights to the eye, but to the mind and heart, that shall lead them safely in the perilous voyage of life, and enable them to transmit the blessings of our liberty to those who shall come after them?

We have set on foot a score of expeditions to explore the mountains and valleys, the lakes and rivers, of this and other countries. We have expended money without stint to explore the Amazon and the Jordan, Chili and Japan, the gold shores of the Colorado and the copper cliffs of Lake Superior, to gather and publish the great facts of science, and to exhibit the material resources of physical nature. Will you refuse the pitiful sum required to collect and record the intellectual resources of this country, the elements that lie behind all material wealth and make it either a curse or a blessing?

We have paid three quarters of a million dollars for the survey of the route for the Pacific railroad, and have published the results in thirteen quarto volumes, with maps and charts accompanying them. The money for these purposes was freely expended, and now, when it is proposed to appropriate $13,000 to aid in increasing the intelligence of those who will use that great continental highway when it is completed, we are reminded of our debts, and warned against increasing our expenditures. It is difficult to treat such an objection with that respect that always is due in this hall of legislation.

We have established a Patent Office where are annually accumulated thousands of models of new machinery invented by our people. Will you make no expenditure for the benefit of the intelligence that shall stand behind that machinery and be its controller? Will you bestow all your favors upon the engine, and ignore the engineer? I will not insult the intelligence of this House by waiting to prove that money paid for education is the most economical of all expenditure. It is cheaper to reduce crime than to build jails. School-houses are less expensive than rebellions. A tenth of our national debt expended in public education fifty years ago would have saved us the blood and treasure of the late war. A far less sum may save our children from a still greater calamity.

We expend hundreds of thousands to promote the agricultural interests of the country, to introduce the best modes of culture in all that pertains to husbandry. Is it not of more consequence to do something for the farmer of the future than for the farm of to-day?

As man is greater than soil, as the immortal spirit is nobler than the clod it animates, so is the object of this bill of more importance than any mere pecuniary interest.

The genius of our Government does not allow us to establish a compulsory system of education, as is done in some of the countries of Europe. There are States in this Union, however, which have adopted a compulsory system of education, and perhaps that is well. It is for the State to determine. A distinguished gentleman from Rhode Island told me lately that it was now the law in that State that every child within its borders should be sent to school, and that every vagrant child should be taken in charge by the authorities and sent to school. It may be well for the States to pursue such a course; but the General Government can do nothing of that sort. It has no compulsory control over this matter, and we propose none in this bill.

But we do propose this: that we shall use that power, so effective in this country, the power of letting in light on subjects and holding them up to the verdict of public opinion. If it could be published annually from this Capitol, if it could go out through every district of the United States that there were States in this Union that had no system of common schools, and if their records could be placed beside the records of such States as Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and other States that have a common-school system, the very light shining upon them would rouse up their energies and compel them to educate their children. It would shame out of their delinquency all the delinquent States of this country.

Mr. Speaker, if I were called upon to-day to point to that in my own State of which I am most proud, I would not point to any of the famous lines of our military record, to the heroic men and the brilliant officers we have given to this contest; I would not point to any of our leading men of the past or the present, as the trophies of our State; but I would point to the common schools of Ohio; I would point to the honorable fact that in the great struggle of five years through which we have just passed, the State of Ohio has expended $12,000,000 for the support of her public schools. I do not include in that the amount expended upon our higher institutions of learning. I would point to the fact that fifty-two per cent. of the taxation of Ohio for the last five years, aside from the war tax and the tax for the payment of the public debt, has been for the support of her schools. I would point to the schools of Cincinnati, of Cleveland, and other cities of the State, if I desired a stranger to see the glory of Ohio. I would point you to the thirteen thousand school-houses and the seven hundred thousand pupils in the schools of Ohio. I would point to the $3,000,000 she has paid for schools during the last year alone. This is, in my judgment, the proper gauge by which to measure the progress of the States of this Union.

Gentlemen tell us there is no need of this bill—the States are doing well enough now. Do they know through what a struggle every State has come up that has secured a good system of common schools? Let me illustrate this by one example. Notwithstanding the early declaration of William Penn—

“That which makes a good constitution must keep it, namely, men of wisdom and virtue; qualities that because they descend not with worldly inheritance must be carefully propagated by a virtuous education of youth, for which spare no cost, for by such parsimony all that is saved is lost.”

Notwithstanding this wise master builder incorporated this sentiment in his “framework of government” and made it the duty of the Governor and Council “to establish and support public schools;” notwithstanding Benjamin Franklin from the first hour he became a citizen of Pennsylvania inculcated the value of useful knowledge to every human being in every walk of life, and by his personal and pecuniary effort did establish schools and a college for Philadelphia; notwithstanding the constitution of Pennsylvania made it obligatory upon the Legislature to foster the education of the citizens; notwithstanding all this, it was not till 1833–34 that a system of common schools supported in part by taxation of the property of the State, for the common benefit of all the children of the State, was established by law; and although the law was passed by an almost unanimous vote of both branches of the Legislature, so foreign was the idea of public schools to the habits of the people, so odious was the idea of taxation for this purpose, that even the poor who were to be specially benefited, were so deluded by the political demagogues as to clamor for its repeal.

Many members who voted for the law lost their nominations, and others, although nominated, lost their election. Some were weak enough to pledge themselves to a repeal of the law; and in the session of 1835 there was an almost certain prospect of its repeal and the adoption in its place of an odious and limited provision for educating the children of the poor by themselves. In the darkest hour of the debate, when the hearts of the original friends of the system were failing from fear, there rose on the floor of the House one of its early champions, one who, though not a native of the State, felt the disgrace which the repeal of this law would give, like a knife in his bosom; one who, though no kith or kin of his would be benefited by the operations of the system, and though he should share its burdens, he would only partake with every citizen in its blessings; one who had voted for the original law although introduced by his political opponents, and who had defended and gloried in his vote before an angry and unwilling constituency; this man, then in the beginning of his public career, threw himself into the conflict and by his earnest and brave eloquence saved the law, and gave a noble system of common schools to Pennsylvania.

I doubt if, at this hour, after the thirty years crowded full of successful labors at the bar, before the people, and in halls of legislation, the venerable and distinguished member [Mr. STEVENS] who now represents a portion of the same State in this House, can recall any speech of his life with half the pleasure he does that, for no measure with which his name has been connected is so fraught with blessings to hundreds of thousands of children, and to homes innumerable.

I hold in my hand a copy of his brave speech, and I ask the Clerk to read the passages I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

“I am comparatively a stranger among you, born in another, in a distant State; no parent or kindred of mine did, does, or probably ever will dwell within your borders. I have none of those strong cords to bind me to your honor and your interest; yet, if there is any one thing on earth which I ardently desire above all others it is to see Pennsylvania standing up in her intellectual, as she confessedly does in her physical resources, high above all her confederate rivals. How shameful, then, would it be for these her native sons to feel less so, when the dust of their ancestors is mingled with her soil, their friends and relatives enjoy her present prosperities, and their descendants, for long ages to come, will partake of her happiness or misery, her glory or her infamy!”

“In giving this law to posterity you act the part of the philanthropist, by bestowing upon the poor as well as the rich the greatest earthly boon which they are capable of receiving; you act the part of the philosopher by pointing, if you do not lead them, up the hill of science; you act the part of the hero, if it be true, as you say, that popular vengeance follows close upon your footsteps. Here, then, if you wish true popularity, is a theater on which you may acquire it.”

“Let all, therefore, who would sustain the character of the philosopher or philanthropist sustain this law. Those who would add thereto the glory of the hero, can acquire it here; for, in the present state of feeling in Pennsylvania, I am willing to admit that but little less dangerous to the public man is the war-club and battle-axe of savage ignorance than to the lion-hearted Richard was the keen scimeter of the Saracens. He who would oppose it, either through inability to comprehend the advantages of general education, or from unwillingness to bestow them on all his fellow-citizens, even to the lowest and the poorest, or from dread of popular vengeance, seems to me to want either the head of the philosopher, the heart of the philanthropist, or the nerve of the hero."

Mr. GARFIELD. He has lived long enough to see this law, which he helped to found in 1834 and more than any other man was instrumental in saving from repeal in 1835, expanded and consolidated into a noble system of public instruction. Twelve thousand schools have been built by the voluntary taxation of the people, to the amount for school-houses alone of nearly ten million dollars. Many millions of children have been educated in these schools. More than seven hundred thousand are returned as in the public schools of Pennsylvania in 1864-65, and the annual cost of these schools, provided by voluntary taxation, in the year 1864, was nearly three million dollars, giving employment to sixteen thousand teachers.

It is glory enough for one man to have connected his name so honorably with the original establishment and early and effective support of such a system.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have not spoken an hour. Am I not entitled to an hour after the calling of the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Ohio began at twenty-seven minutes after one o'clock, one hour ago. At that time the gentleman rose as he stated to close the debate. He then yielded portions of his time to various gentlemen. At five minutes before two o'clock he demanded the previous question. The effect of that, however, is not to give the gentleman an hour after the call of the previous question when he had already obtained the floor and consumed a portion of his hour by yielding to other gentlemen. The Digest, on page 143, states that—

"The right of the member reporting the pending measure to close the debate is never denied him, even after the previous question is ordered."

The gentleman from Ohio, having reported this bill, was entitled to an hour to open the debate and an hour to close it. Having opened the debate, he could not, according to parliamentary usage, be recognized while other gentlemen who had not spoken were claiming the floor, unless he rose to close the debate; and as he stated that such was his purpose, the Chair recognized him as entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that, by unanimous consent, the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended.

Mr. PIKE. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am obliged to the gentleman from Maine. I gave him twice as much time as he first asked.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered, debate is exhausted upon the proposition. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to make a single inquiry of the Chair. Did not the time occupied by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] come out of the time of my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD?]

The SPEAKER. The Chair made a statement a moment ago, which perhaps the gentleman did not hear. The Chair will repeat.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who reported this bill, had the right to open and to close the debate. He had a right to make two speeches, while other gentlemen had the right to make but one. The gentleman, the other day, opened the debate. At twenty-seven minutes after one o'clock to-day he rose to close the debate. He then yielded portions of his time to various gentlemen. At five minutes before two o'clock he demanded the previous question, after the seconding of which and the ordering of the main question he proceeded with his remarks, the previous question not interfering with his right to do so, as will be seen by the extract from the Digest which was read a few moments ago.

Mr. SCHENCK. The purpose of my inquiry was simply to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] to the fact that the time which he occupied came out of my colleague's time.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. PIKE. Yes, sir; but when I rose to speak no member had been heard in opposition to the bill—

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order without unanimous consent.

Mr. PIKE. I will be more generous than the gentleman from Ohio, and will withdraw my objection.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I renew the objection.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. GRINNELL, it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the substitute proposed by Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 67, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barker, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Brewster, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Davis, De-frees, Delano, Dodge, Driggs, Gossbrenner, Hale, Abner C. So the substitute proposed by Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. PIKE and Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 61, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Boutwell, Brewster, Cullom, Davis, De-frees, Dodge, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hayes, Henderson, Hooper, Asahel W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Deming, Denison Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, and Winfield—63.

So the bill was rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. RICE, of Maine, stated that he was paired with Mr. PATTERSON, who would vote for the bill, while he would vote against it.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS, from the joint committee on reconstruction, submitted a written report; which was ordered to be printed and laid upon the table.

Mr. STEVENS submitted a motion to print fifty thousand extra copies; which, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ROGERS. I will state that by consent of the committee a minority report will be submitted in a short time.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. RAYMOND. I rise to make a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the fortification bill. The Senate made an amendment to that bill as originally reported, inserting an appropriation of $50,000 for Fort Popham, on the Kennebec river, in the State of Maine, to which the House disagreed. The committee of conference recommend that the House recede from its disagreement and agree to the amendment.

The report was adopted.

Mr. RAYMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARIA SYPHAX.

The SPEAKER stated the business in order was the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. THAYER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back Senate bill No. 321, for the relief of Maria Syphax with a recommendation that it do pass.

It proposes to release and confirm to Maria Syphax, her heirs and assigns, the title to a piece of land, being part of the Arlington estate, in the county of Alexandria, in the State of Virginia, upon which she has resided since about the year 1826, bounded and described as follows, to wit: beginning at the intersection of the south line of said Arlington estate with the center line of a small run, said point of intersection being about one fourth of a mile from the southwest corner of said Arlington estate, running thence westerly along said south line seven chains and forty links; thence in a northeasterly direction, on a line making an angle of thirty-five degrees with the said south line, twenty-two chains and twenty-eight links; thence at right angles, in a southeasterly direction fifteen chains and sixty-seven links to the said south line of the Arlington estate; thence westerly along the said south line of the said Arlington estate nineteen chains and ninety-two links, to the place of beginning, containing seventeen acres and fifty-three one hundredths of an acre of land, be the same more or less.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill for the relief of Maria Syphax. The name of Syphax, although a strange and unusual one, does not now for the first time appear in the history of human affairs. Those of us who recall the long and dreamy hours in which in our school-boy days, with our big Ainsworth by our side, we plodded through the pages of Livy and Sallust, will remember it as the name of that unfortunate Numidian king who in an ill-starred hour—seduced by his marriage with the daughter of Asdrubal, the Carthaginian—forgot her alliance with Rome and joined himself with that of Carthage, a step which as we well remember resulted in his defeat and capture by Masinissa, his delivery to Scipio, and his being led in chains through the streets of Rome to grace the magnificent triumph awarded to that successful general.

The modern Syphax, the Syphax of the present bill, although of African descent like the royal Syphax of yore, is a much humbler personage. The points of her career so far as they stand in relation to her ancient and historic namesake are points of contrast and not points of resemblance. The latter was born a king, the former was born a slave. The latter deserted the solemn oaths which bound him to the republic which had afforded him the protection of an ally, the former adhered through all the storms and trials of civil war to the republic which fostered and defended herself and her people. The fortunes of the latter went from good to bad and from bad to worse continually, until they culminated in the ruin of his hopes and his death in a Roman prison in the obscure village of Tibur. The fortunes of the former have improved day by day, until from slavery she has become with her people and her children, free, independent, and happy. Her eyes in her old age look out brightly and happily upon a land from which the last foot-prints of slavery have vanished and where her people enjoy the protection of equal rights and equal laws.

Maria Syphax's parents were the servants of Mrs. Washington. They passed by devise to her grandson, George Washington Parke Custis. In 1826, when Maria Syphax, for whose benefit this bill was introduced, was married, Mr. Custis emancipated her and settled her upon a small tract of land containing about seventeen acres, which lies upon the southern border of the estate of Arlington. By his last will he also emancipated the husband of Maria. Since the year 1826 Maria Syphax and her husband and their children have lived and labored and thrived upon that little spot of land. Their occupancy of it was always acquiesced in by Mrs. Lee, the daughter of Mr. Custis, and by her husband, Robert E. Lee. Their possession was never interfered with by them. They scrupulously respected the provision which had been made for them by Mr. Custis.

In the year 1868 this little plot of land, together with the remainder of the Arlington estate, was sold by the Government of the United States under the act of Congress approved June 7, 1862, entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts," and was bought by the United States. The object of the present bill is to release to Maria Syphax and her heirs the land which was given to her by Mr. Custis, and which she, her husband, and her children have occupied and tilled for a period of forty years.

I believe now I have said everything which is necessary to a full understanding of this case, and perhaps something that was not. If any gentleman wishes to ask any questions I am ready to respond to them; or if any one wishes to make any remarks upon the bill I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to ask the gentleman whether possession for forty years by this lady and her family was not an adverse possession which would give title to it, and if so, whether there is any necessity for legislation?

Mr. THAYER. Their possession I do not understand to have been adverse in the legal sense of that phrase. On the contrary, it was a possession founded on a parol grant from Mr. Custis—a grant which was always acquiesced in by those who succeeded him in the enjoyment of his estate.

Mr. FINCK. Would not the possession of forty years have rightly entitled the party to the property?

Mr. THAYER. Well, sir, I do not care to split hairs with the gentleman from Ohio, or to try this case in the House of Representatives as if it were an ejectment in a court of law. The case as it stands is simply this: these parties have no written title to their estate. Of course it was not customary for masters to give written titles to those who had been their slaves. But Maria Syphax has a possession extending through a period of forty years, founded upon a parol gift from the master who manumitted her, and all that the Government of the United States is asked to do is to release its title acquired by a tax sale, and to confirm her in her just possession.

Mr. HALE. I did not understand from the gentleman's speech where the legal title is now vested.

Mr. THAYER. In the United States under the tax sale to which I have referred, the Government of the United States having purchased the Arlington estate at that sale.

Mr. JOHNSON. A single question. I ask my colleague whether there is not a day of redemption under the tax law, and whether that day has gone by.

Mr. THAYER. There was a period fixed by the statute during which the parties might redeem, but the day of redemption has passed. The day of redemption for the land has passed, but the day of redemption for the countrymen of Syphax, King of Numidia, has come, never to pass away in the United States. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. THAYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY ROBERTSON.

Mr. THAYER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported adversely on the petition of Mary Robertson, and others, asking for indemnity for land taken by the United States at Rouse's Point; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

MOSES SHOUP.

Mr. THAYER, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Moses Shoup, of Green county, Ohio; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

JOSÉ DOMÍNGUEZ.

Mr. THAYER, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 189, to confirm a grant of certain land to José Dominguez, in California, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. It confirms the title of the petitioner to a grant of land in Santa Barbara county, California, made in 1845.

Mr. THAYER. This is one of those claims which the United States, by the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, are bound to confirm if the evidence of the claim is clear and properly substantiated. The committee have examined it and believe it should be confirmed. I will ask the Clerk to read the following letter, not so much for its bearing upon the case as for its reference to a very singular natural curiosity which exists upon this estate.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 9, 1866.

DEAR SIR: I beg to call your especial attention to Senate bill No. 189, and the accompanying document. I was in the county of Santa Barbara last September, and visited the rancho in question as matter of curiosity to see a large grape vine growing upon it, said to be the second largest in the world; I measured it myself and found it covered a superficial area of over eight thousand feet. This single vine is about the sole product of the entire rancho, the lands being very hilly and semi-mountainous in their character. I found the mother of the petitioner and the entire family of children, grand-children, and great grand-children, most of them living under this celebrated vine; the sale of grapes from it being about their only support; last year the product of this single vine being about six tons of grapes, as they told me. The old lady died last fall upon the property at the age of one hundred and nine years, she and her husband having lived undisturbed upon this property for upward of sixty years. The vine was planted by the old lady some fifty years ago. I found the family very poor, and enjoying the respect of all parties in the county. I visited the vine and family in company with Mr. Sparks, an American, who had lived in the county since 1832. He verified the correctness of all the statements of the family, and, from what I saw myself, and from what was told me by very respectable citizens of the county, I have no doubt of the truthfulness of all the statements of José Dominguez in his petition.

In my judgment there cannot be presented a case calling more for the equitable interposition of the Government to protect the grant of the former Government to the family than this; and earnestly ask that you will examine the papers and make an effort in their behalf.

Very respectfully,
LEVI PARSONS.
Hon. IRA HARRIS, United States Senator.

Mr. THAYER. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. THAYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSÉ SERAFÍN RAMÍREZ.

Mr. THAYER, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 173, to confirm the title of José Serafin Ramirez to certain lands in New Mexico, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read.

Mr. THAYER. This is a case which resembles the one upon which the House has just passed. The title seems to be perfectly plain from the Mexican Government. The owner of the estate complied with all the requisitions of the Mexican law, and the committee believe it is proper that the title should be confirmed by the United States. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. THAYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND TITLES IN SANTA BARBARA.

Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made an adverse report on House bill No. 579, to quiet the title to lands in the town of Santa Barbara; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

JOHN B. CHAPMAN.

Mr. KERR, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of John B. Chapman, asking for relief for a section of land he has improved, located on Puget sound, Washington Territory; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

E. WOODWARD AND G. CHORPENNING.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back House joint resolution No. 123, for the relief of Elizabeth Woodward and George Chorpennning, of Pennsylvania.

The joint resolution was read. It appropriates $32,325 to each of the petitioners in payment for the destruction of property by the Indians.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I move the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 15) authorizing documentary evidence of titles to be furnished to the owners of certain lands in the city of St. Louis; and

An act (H. R. No. 28) to amend the postal laws.

CAPTAIN JAMES STARKEY.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, also reported a bill for the relief of Captain James Starkey; which was read a first and second time.

The bill appropriates the sum of $100 to reimburse James Starkey, late captain of the St. Paul light infantry, the amount paid by him to Richard Postel for the loss of a horse killed in a fight with the Indians.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SETTLERS ON SIOUX RESERVATION, MINNESOTA.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, House joint resolution No. 126, for the relief of certain settlers on the Sioux reservation, in the State of Minnesota.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that persons who settled and made improvements upon lands now included in the Sioux reservation, and filed copies of their claims in the proper local land office before the boundaries of the reservation were definitely surveyed and located, shall be authorized to enter the lands thus settled upon as in other cases of preemption, upon the payment of $1 25 per acre therefor, under such rules and regulations as may be provided by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WINDOM called the previous question. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MICHIGAN INDIANS.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, also asked leave to report a joint resolution for the relief of certain Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians, in the State of Michigan.

The joint resolution was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan, in pursuance of an agreement and compromise made with the Pottawatomie nation of Indians, so named and designated in the treaty of 1846, the sum of $39,000 in full of all claims, past, present, and future, in favor of said Michigan Indians, either against the United States or the said nation of Indians, arising out of any treaty made with them, or any band or confederation thereof; and the annuity now paid to them shall be restored and paid to said Indians for the future; this sum of $39,000 to be appropriated out of the funds of said Indians held in trust for them by the United States, and to be paid by the proper agent of the Government direct to heads of families, adults, and guardians of minors as now required by law in reference to annuities.

Mr. SPALDING. I raise the point of order that this is not a private bill.

The SPEAKER. It is a public bill, and therefore not in order on this day, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

COLONEL H. C. DE AHNA.

Mr. BLAINE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution for the payment of the claim of Colonel H. C. De Ahna, for military services; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution directs the proper disbursing and accounting officers of the Treasury to pay Henry Charles De Ahna a sum equal to the pay, allowances, and emoluments of a colonel of infantry for one year from March 31, 1862, and that he be considered honorably mustered out of service.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is there any report accompanying this joint resolution? If so I would like to hear it read.

Mr. BLAINE. The matter was favorably reported upon in the last Congress. The committee can submit that same report; but it is a pretty long one. This joint resolution passed the House during the last Congress, but failed in the Senate.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not care to have the report read if it is a long one; all I desire is to know the facts of the case.

Mr. BLAINE. I will call on the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session, and who drew up the report, and who is entirely familiar with all the facts of the case. He can state the facts of the case in much less time than I can.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not looked at the report since I made it at the last Congress. But I remember very well the substance of the facts.

This officer was appointed a colonel and entered the service under General Fremont in Missouri. He was transferred from one duty to another, and finally his name was sent on here for promotion to the rank of brigadier general. He was so nominated by the President, and his name was sent into the Senate for confirmation. But about the time the nomination was to be acted on, a telegram from General Halleck was sent on here, intimating that there was something wrong about the man; indeed he said in pretty broad terms that he was unworthy. Hence the Senate refused to confirm his nomination. But for a considerable time after his rejection by the Senate, he continued on duty as a colonel. Subsequently, without any authority of the Secretary of War, but simply by the action of General Halleck, he was mustered out of service. Thus there was a long period during which he was actually in the service doing duty under the orders of the War Department, but for which he was never paid. It was in some way managed that, when the order mustering him out was issued, the paymaster could not, on account of the informality of the paper, give him his pay.

I do not know that in the history of our military affairs I have ever known a case in which a person was so badly treated as the evidence shows this officer was. He was very much persecuted by some of his superiors in command. After very careful examination the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, at the last Congress, agreed that this officer ought to be paid for the time during which he had actually rendered service, with the understanding that on the acceptance of such payment he should be regarded as honorably mustered out, if there was any doubt about the legality of the previous muster-out, and that this payment should be a full and final settlement of his claim. I think that the passage of this bill is the very smallest measure of justice which this Congress ought to award this officer. The amount proposed to be allowed him is one year's pay as a colonel, thus covering the actual term of service.

I trust that no member of the House will insist that anybody shall go into the details of this case, for the facts reveal a course of oppression and injustice against a man who appears to have been guilty of no other crime than that of being a foreigner. The Committee on Military Affairs in the last Congress were unanimous in favor of this measure, with, perhaps, the exception of one member, and I believe that the bill is now reported with the unanimous approval of the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. The facts in this case were examined by the Military Committee of the House at the last session; and that committee has at this session gone over the facts again; and the committee now recommend the same measure of relief which was recommended by the committee during the last session. I think the bill eminently just. I do not wish to detain the House by any further remarks, and therefore I call the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Maine will permit me to inquire whether the amount proposed to be paid by the bill now before us is the same as that which the committee during the last Congress reported should be paid.

Mr. BLAINE. The amount is precisely the same as that recommended to be paid by the Committee on Military Affairs in the last Congress; and the bill then reported was passed in this House by a very large majority.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does this cover the time during which this officer actually performed service?

Mr. BLAINE. It does not cover all the time during which he was actually in commission; but it covers all the time during which he was actually on duty. The bill is a kind of compromise. It does not give the officer the full amount which he claims.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Has he been mustered out?

Mr. BLAINE. There is a question with reference to that; but the bill proposes that he shall now be honorably mustered out, receiving the pay of a colonel for one year. I call the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Speaker, as no report has been read in this case, I believe I must raise the point of order that this bill, involving an appropriation of money, must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLAINE. There is no appropriation in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that this is an appropriation bill; but if it were, it is too late now to raise the point after the bill has been debated.

NATIONAL BUREAU OF EDUCATION—AGAIN.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] consents to yield me the floor for a moment; and I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 276) to establish a national Bureau of Education was negatived.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be made now during the pending of another bill on which the previous question has been called.

COLONEL H. C. DE AHNA—AGAIN.

Mr. BLAINE. I insist on my demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUGAN'S INFANTRY TACTICS.

Mr. ROUSSEAU, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution authorizing the purchase of Dugan's work on infantry tactics; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that, with the view to a more general dissemination of the knowledge of infantry tactics among the officers and soldiers in the service of the United States, the Secretary of War be authorized and empowered to purchase for the use of the Army ten thousand copies of the work on infantry instruction prepared by Colonel James Dugan, and as many additional copies from time to time as in the opinion of the Secretary of War may be necessary; provided that the price shall not exceed $1 25 per copy.

Mr. LE BLOND. I make the point of order that this is a public and not a private matter.

The SPEAKER. It is a private matter, it is to publish copies of a work.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will let us have some explanation of it.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. The tactics which are proposed to be published are an improvement on Casey's tactics. It makes no change. It is recommended by General Grant, and perhaps half a dozen other officers of the Army. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOUIS V. BAURSCH.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the petition of Louis V. Baurisch, late second lieutenant of company B, nineteenth Pennsylvania cavalry, and moved that it be laid upon the table, as it was provided for in the general law; and he further moved that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the House.

It was ordered accordingly.

NATIONAL BUREAU OF EDUCATION—AGAIN.

Mr. HALE. I wish to inquire whether it is in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was rejected.

The SPEAKER. Not until after the House has reconsidered the vote by which the bill was rejected.

Mr. HALE. I give notice that I will make that motion.

CAPTURED REBEL GUNS.

Mr. KETCHAM, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution relative to certain guns captured in the late war; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that the Secretary of War be authorized, when in his judgment he shall deem it expedient, to deposit at Washington's former headquarters near Newburg, New York, three pieces of cannon captured at Dingle's Mills, South Carolina.

Mr. LE BLOND. I cannot see how that can be brought in as a private bill.

The SPEAKER. It is a private matter, and the Chair will have read an extract from the decision which he made at this session in reference to a bill relating to the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The same volume of May's Parliamentary Practice states that private bills 'are for the interest of an individual, a public company or corporation, a parish, a city, a county or other locality.'"

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this would be for the interest of a city.

Mr. KETCHAM. I will state that the three guns to which reference is made were captured by the fifty-sixth regiment of New York volunteers, raised in the district in which Washington's headquarters are located. They are now deposited there by permission of the Secretary of War. As he is required to place all captured guns at arsenals, he cannot permit these to remain except by the action of Congress. These are the only captured guns not returned to the arsenals. These headquarters now belong to the State of New York. There are there many captured guns and other mementoes of the revolutionary war, the war of 1812, and the Mexican war, and it seems to me to be the proper place at which to deposit these trophies.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. KETCHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

H. A. BINGHAM.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the petition of H. A. Bingham, paymaster United States Army, and moved that it be laid upon the table, as the case was provided for by general law.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I report back from the Committee on Military Affairs sundry petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay adequate to meet their personal necessities. As a general law has been reported on the subject, I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of these petitions, and that they be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EMIL COHEN.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill changing the name of Emil Cohen; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

D. BROOKS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an adverse report on the memorial of D. Brooks; which was laid on the table.

OFFICERS OF STEAMER SUMTER.

Mr. LE BLOND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a joint resolution in behalf of Peter Hayes, and others; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of Peter Hayes, et al, officers of the United States steamer Sumter, to ascertain the value of all the clothing and effects by them respectively lost at the time of her destruction, and to allow them for the same, to an amount not exceeding $5,000 in the aggregate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether this joint resolution changes the rule in relation to payments for clothing lost by seamen. There is a rule, I believe, now established by law in relation to such losses.

Mr. LE BLOND. The general law does not apply to this class of cases.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I would like to hear some explanation from the gentleman.

Mr. LE BLOND. The report will disclose all the facts in the case. I demand the previous question on the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. I now ask for the reading of the report.

The report was read. It sets forth that about one o'clock a. m. of June 24, 1863, the United States steamer Sumter while about eight miles off Cape Henry, Virginia, was run into by the propeller General Meigs, and so damaged by the collision that she very soon sank in over eight fathoms of water. It also sets forth that the officers and crew of the Sumter are entirely blameless as to her loss, and were watchful and vigilant both before and subsequent to the collision. The committee report further that shortly after the collision a board of naval officers was instituted to inquire into the circumstances attending the loss of the said steamer, and to report their judgment in the premises.

The committee express their coincidence in the opinion of this board as expressed in the following words, to wit:

"It is the opinion of the court that none of the officers or crew of the Sumter are to blame for the loss of that vessel.

"The officers and crew seem to have been vigilant, orderly, and obedient; the 'look-outs' were properly stationed, and the proper lights were burning."

The committee report further, that in their opinion the officers of the Sumter exercised due care and caution, both before and after the collision; that they lost nearly all their personal effects on board the Sumter, without fault or negligence on their part; that they are required by the Navy Department to provide themselves, at their own expense, with a full-dress uniform, an undress uniform, and a service dress, at an expense of several hundred dollars. The committee say further that officers of the Army are paid for horses lost in battle; that soldiers are paid a clothing allowance, and sailors receive compensation in case of the loss of their clothing, without fault on their part. In view of the analogy between the two branches of the service, the committee report in favor of this allowance to the officers of the Sumter.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] if this is not a departure from the rule which the Government has adopted in similar cases heretofore. I understand that there is a limitation in all the acts which have heretofore been passed providing that not more than a certain sum shall be paid. It seems to me that by the terms of this joint resolution the payment to the officers and seamen on board the Sumter is not limited as such payments have been heretofore.

Mr. LE BLOND. The gentleman will remember that this is a payment for clothing. There is a law upon the subject authorizing such payment to the sailors, but it does not reach the officers of the vessel. This is a peculiar case. There is no law authorizing payment to these officers for the loss of their clothing. This joint resolution simply proposes to pay them for that loss, and they have to make proof to the proper Department before they can get that pay.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It occurs to me that a very different rule has been established in other cases. In regard to the officers of the gunboat Cincinnati, which was sunk at Vicksburg during the siege of that place, my recollection is that the amount allowed to each officer was limited to fifty dollars.

Mr. LE BLOND. Let me say that there have been several bills and resolutions passed making pay for such losses, but none reaching the officers that I know of. Now, officers are required to have, by the regulations of the service, a certain amount of clothing. This joint resolution goes upon the principle of a bill which has already passed the House this afternoon. We have passed a bill, since the morning hour commenced, paying an Army officer for the loss of his horse without any neglect on his part. If that bill is correct, and in my judgment it is, I ask if it is not eminently proper that an officer of the Navy, who is compelled by the naval regulations to have certain clothing with them, and loses it without any neglect on his part, should be compensated as well as the man in the Army who loses his horse, which the regulations require him to have in the field. The principle in the two cases is precisely the same; and I am in favor of applying the same principle to the officers of both branches of the service.

I now ask for the question.

The question being upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time, it was put; and there were—ayes 24, noes 44; no quorum voting.

And then, on motion of Mr. THAYER, (at ten minutes after four o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees
By Mr. DODGE: The petition of Henry Clews & Co., for the issue of a new bond in place of a registered bond lost.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia: The petition of Colonel David T. Howes, of Clarksburg, West Virginia, asking compensation for the use of his property and damages to the same by the United States troops.

By Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY: The petition of the Bank of Attica, New York, for modification of the act taxing the bills of State banks.

By Mr. KELSO: The memorial of citizens of Missouri, in favor of Mrs. Mary Phelps.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: A petition of citizens of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, praying for an increase of duty upon foreign wools.

By Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts: The petition of O. H. Perry, and others, against extending the patent of S. R. Parkhurst.

Also, the petition of William Amory, and others, in aid of the same.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 9, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ELIOT. I wish to say that my colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, has been necessarily absent from the House during the past week, and has been paired with Mr. STROUSE, of Pennsylvania, since Tuesday last. I ask leave of absence for him until Tuesday next.

No objection being made, the leave of absence was granted.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. VAN HORN, for one week.

No objection being made, the leave of absence was granted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks leave of absence for Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, for two weeks.

No objection being made, the leave of absence was granted.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. It happens, and probably will happen during the whole of the residue of the session, that frequently during sessions of the House it is necessary for some member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills to be absent, either in examining and comparing enrolled bills or else in presenting them to the President for his signature. I therefore ask permission to be absent during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is prohibited on Saturdays. It is business which would require a vote of the House. The gentleman had better postpone his motion till Monday.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Very well, sir; I will do so.

CONGRESSIONAL PAY AND MILEAGE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the amounts paid for salary and mileage to the members of the Thirty-Eighth Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ARSENAL EXPLOSION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the commandant of the Washington arsenal, transmitting a statement of the distribution of money to the sufferers by the late explosion in the said arsenal; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 255) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending June 30, 1867.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, two thirds of the Senate agreeing thereto, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, with sundry amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to give notice that it is the purpose of the committee on reconstruction to call up on next Wednesday, immediately after the morning hour, the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

RICHARD L. LAW.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate joint resolution No. 100, for the restoration of Lieutenant Commander Richard L. Law, of the United States Navy, to the active list from the reserved list, was yesterday referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LEVEES OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the board of commissioners in Louisiana in reference to the levees of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The House then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a short time, that I may have an opportunity to express my views upon the present management of our Indian relations, especially in the Northwest, where, in my judgment, large sums of money are being squandered, to meet which extravagant appropriations are called for by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

If, in the discussion of this subject, I chance to use plain and unmistakable language, my excuse shall be that the interests of the public service demand a thorough understanding of it. If I should happen to expose a system of official mismanagement and corruption, my apology will be that I stand here as the chosen representative of a people whose happiness, prosperity, and personal safety depend upon the good faith, fair dealing, and honest administration of every department of the Government having control of our Indian affairs.

It is very seldom that I have troubled the House with remarks upon any subject, and I believe never, unless it was when some measure was before it which interested my own constituents. I should not ask its indulgence at this time did I not regard it as a duty which I owe to the country as well as to the people of Dakota. I hardly know how I could justify a silence on my part now, if ever so much disposed to do so, since I have the honor to represent here one of the nine great Territories of the nation, and the one which I am confident contains a greater number of square miles and a larger Indian population than either of the others, and the interest of which I am bound to protect.

Within the boundaries of Dakota there are more than thirty thousand savages, three fourths of whom, during the last four years, have been waging a murderous war against its unprotected citizens.

Dakota is fast filling up with an industrious and intelligent white population who are flocking within its borders from every loyal State of the Union, and who are vitally interested in bringing about and maintaining the most friendly relations with all of our northwestern Indian tribes. Our people have an incentive which urges an enduring establishment of peaceful relations with the Indians of that country, which towers above and overrides every other consideration—one which neither Congress, the Commissioner, nor the nation can trifle with. It is that of peace and safety to themselves, their wives, and their children; and it would be well for those who thrive from the margin of blanket and grow fat from provision and all other contracts made in connection with the Indian service, whether made in Washington or elsewhere, to remember that they are trifling with the lives of innocent beings whenever they engage in these sharp operations.

I have spent the last five years of my life in the country inhabited by the Sioux Indians of Dakota. During that period I endeavored carefully to study their wants, their habits of life, and the relations which these people actually sustain to the white population, now so rapidly filling up, and improving the rich lands of the extreme Northwest—hoping that information thus acquired might be of some service in solving the difficult problem as to the best method of disposing of this race in a manner that shall confer the greatest good to its people and entail the least evil upon ourselves.

Nothing is surer than that the Indian race is passing away before the onward tread of the white man and the irresistible influence of civilization, which has borne him from the shores of the Atlantic and is still bearing him onward to the remotest recesses of this continent.

Wherever research is made and it is ascertained that labor can be profitably employed; wherever the white man can find a comfortable home for himself and family, and securely lay the foundation of his cot, however humble it may be, there he will go, and the Indian must either willingly or reluctantly surrender his claim to the soil, and abandon his birthright to the hardy pioneers of civilization.

Gentlemen may reason as they will; they may eulogize the Indian character and magnify his wrongs; they may resort to the most plausible and humane theories, shed tears of sympathy over Cooper's finely wrought pictures, and Longfellow's glowing verse; they may try to make the Indian, as we find him, a real perfection, out of their ideal standard of natural nobility; but it all will not avail to change either his nature or his destiny. Less than eight years ago what is now the ceded portion of Dakota was the home and hunting-ground of the Yankton-Sioux and Ponca Indians. As soon as the Indian title to the lands was extinguished, the advance guard of civilization crossed the western boundaries of Iowa and Minnesota in search of homes in Dakota. There they staked off their claims, built their cabins, and commenced improving their farms. Slowly but surely our population has been increasing, notwithstanding the many obstacles which it has had to surmount. From the Big Sioux our frontier settlements have been extended more than two hundred miles westward into the heart of the Territory. Instead of being one vast waste, as then, we now have a rapidly improving country, dotted over with the fruitful fields and happy homes of an enterprising, hardy, self-sustaining, liberty-loving people. The rude wigwam of the savage has given place to comfortable habitations of intelligent industry. The buffalo has been startled from his primitive pastures by the Durham and Ayrshire; the mustang has given place to the Messenger and Morgan; the deer and the antelope to fleecy flocks; while the miserable Indian, with his inferior surroundings, has deserted his former hunting-grounds and is fast passing away before the steady advance of the white man, for whose inheritance this country seems to have been especially created. The footprints of the Caucasian are everywhere visible in the soil of all our western Territories, as well upon the mountain-tops as in its deepest cañons and broadest plains. The genius of enterprise and industry has already extended his wand over the fertile vastness of the great West, and as if by more than magic power has infused a new life into its productive valleys and gold-bearing mountains. The future of that country is already fixed; the fate of the Indian is sealed as effectually and as materially as was that of the Canaanites before the advancing armies of Israel as they moved forward to possess the promised land of their inheritance. Unwise legislation might perhaps interpose a puny obstacle, but it can no more permanently stop the surging, rolling tide of western emigration in its onward way to the Pacific, than it can prevent the changes of the seasons or stay the flight of time.

The only great question which Congress is now called upon to meet in connection with this subject is, not what is to finally become of the Indian race? This question has been determined by a higher power than you possess, by a more inexorable decree. His ultimate end is already fixed, his doom is sealed by a power which is superior to your laws and above your constitutions. The only question left for you to determine is, how shall this Government now discharge its last duty to the few remaining representatives of the once powerful tribes which formerly possessed the entire extent of all the territory now embraced within our national boundaries? How shall this be done for the Indian, the rights and privileges of our own race be preserved, and the material interests of the country developed.

Without digressing further from the question which I propose to discuss, I will conclude these preliminary remarks and call the attention of Congress to some of the evils attending the administration of our Indian affairs which demand correction. And first I will notice the recent treaties which have been sent to the Senate for confirmation, and give my reasons for urging that the appropriations asked for by the Commissioner for carrying into effect these pretended negotiations ought not to be made.

In the first place, they are not such treaties as should engage the attention of Congress a moment longer than may be necessary to discover that they are a delusion and a fraud which some one is attempting to practice upon the Government, if not upon the Indians. All former treaties made as these were made have accomplished no good, but on the contrary have been fruitful with incalculable mischief. Every adult male Indian claims the right to be present and participate in the council of his tribe. He is a joint owner with every other Indian of his band in the country which they occupy, and especially is the right claimed by him and conceded by all the rest that he is to participate in their councils of war, as well as in the treaties by which peace is secured, or their common hunting-grounds are ceded to other tribes or to the Government of the United States.

Now, let us look for a moment at the manner in which these pretended treaties were made in the fall of 1865 with the Sioux Indians of the upper Missouri. I think it is due to Congress and the country that a little light should be thrown upon these as well as other recent transactions of the Indian department before appropriating large sums of money upon the estimates of the Commissioner to provide for the Indian service for the coming year. Let us look at the management of this department or branch of the Government dispassionately, seeking information rather than favors, and ascertain whether it is a source of aid and protection of civilization and Christianization for those for whose benefit it was created or whether it is not a "whitened sepulcher full of dead men's bones." And here let me call the attention of the House to a statement of facts pertaining to the assemblage of Indians who were engaged with the officers of the Government in making these important negotiations of which we have heard so much of late, and which facts are fully substantiated by the treaties themselves.

The following is a list of the Indian tribes on the upper Missouri, and principally in Dakota Territory, with which treaties are said to have been made in the fall of 1865 by the commissioners of the United States; also the names, number of lodges, number of persons in each, and the number of Indians present at the making of said treaties:

	Lodges.	Persons.	Present.
Brules.....	150	900	50
Two Kettles.....	150	900	150
Minneconjunes.....	400	2,400	20
Sans Arcs.....	250	1,500	4
Uncapapas.....	450	2,700	14
Blackfeet.....	180	1,080	6
Ogalalas.....	350	2,100	3
Upper Yanktonais.....	450	2,700	15
Lower Yanktonais.....	250	1,500	26
Platte Brules.....	400	2,700	-
	3,030	18,480	297

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to say, in all candor, and I speak understandingly, that a very great deal of the difficulty which the Government and its citizens have had with the northwestern Indians during the last thirty years has been caused by just such fraudulent treaties as these now under discussion, and for the fulfillment of which you will soon be called upon to appropriate these large sums of money. To think of concluding a valid treaty with a tribe of savages numbering twenty-one hundred with only three of its members present to participate in the negotiation is supremely ridiculous. To attempt to palm off such a transaction upon the Government is a fraud of the grossest character. No body of white men would abide by such a transaction, nor will the Indians of those tribes. Is it reasonable to suppose that the Uncapapas, numbering, as they do, twenty-seven hundred souls, nearly all of whom were at the time of the treaty hostile, and who are still hostile to our Government, and who are now engaged in murdering and robbing our people, will pay the least attention to the pretended stipulations made with fourteen irresponsible members of their tribe, all of whom were either too lazy to hunt or too cowardly to pursue the war path? Why, sir, I am astonished at the whole transaction. The consummate stupidity which planned these negotiations is only surpassed by the reprehensible meanness in which their details have been carried out, and the total lack of practical results which have followed. Such treaties as these never have and never will restore peaceful relations with our Indian tribes, they will only be instrumental in swelling our national debt and lining the pockets of the favored gentlemen who are selected to disburse the munificent appropriations of a too confiding Congress. The whole affair is perfectly absurd, and no man of sense who is at all familiar with the Sioux Indians of the upper Missouri would for a moment entertain the idea that peace could result from such sham negotiations.

"ART. 8. Any amendment or modification of this treaty by the Senate of the United States shall be considered final and binding upon the said band, represented in council, as a part of this treaty, in the same manner as if it had been subsequently presented and agreed to by the chiefs and head-men of said band."

That is to say, that this treaty with the Uncapapas, in the making of which but fourteen persons out of twenty-seven hundred participated, shall undergo "amendments or modifications" at the pleasure of the Senate; thus denying the whole of said tribe any participation whatever in a solemn treaty by the terms of which our Government declares that they shall be irrevocably bound.

These treaties, which have been concluded and ratified by the Senate and proclaimed by the President, are not worth the paper they disgrace. They will neither tranquillize the Indians nor bring peace and safety to our frontiers.

Indulge me while I read the following extracts from the Sioux City Register of March 10, 1866:

"A private letter from Crow Creek brings intelligence of an important nature. A large party of Brules and Tetons came to the fort from the upper country, and while camped in the vicinity of the agency they formed a plan to capture the fort, kill all the whites and Santees, and steal the stores; but the plot became known to some of the Santees, who immediately made it known to Captain Sewell, the post commander. He immediately took proper measures to guard against a surprise, and then quietly awaited their coming.

"But they did not come, they found their plot had been discovered; so they struck their tepees and started for the upper country, and at last accounts had not been heard from. We understand that the trouble is occasioned by Captain Sewell's refusal to give them an unlimited supply of subsistence stores, and the Indians were indignant at his refusal.

"This is the result of the recent peace commission, and from present indications we may expect similar demonstrations at other points as soon as the weather gets warm enough to enable our 'red brothers' to travel conveniently."

"Recent advices from Fort Sully state that the Indians are becoming quite troublesome, stealing everything they can lay their hands on, besides driving off cattle at every opportunity; and if things continue that way much longer the garrison will be brought down to salt-junk."

In addition to this, these treaties do not claim to have acquired for the Government a single acre of land, not one mountain, not a valley, not a plain. The right of way, ever a matter of the greatest importance to the people of the Northwest, through the country occupied by the Indians with whom these farcical treaties profess to have been made has not been obtained, notwithstanding a section to that effect adorns a page of these rare diplomatic productions. Now, let us take another look at these solemn treaties:

"ART. 4. The said band, represented in council, shall withdraw from the routes overland already established or hereafter to be established through their country; and in consideration thereof, and of their non-interference with the persons and property of citizens of the United States traveling thereon, the Government of the United States agree to pay to the said band the sum of $10,000 annually for twenty years, in such articles as the Secretary of the Interior may direct: Provided, That said band, so represented in council, shall faithfully conform to the requirements of this treaty."

Now, sir, what are the facts in relation to this matter? Simply these: notwithstanding these treaties declare that the Indians "shall withdraw from the routes overland already established or hereafter to be established," this provision was never assented to by the Indians, nor anything of the kind. So far from having granted the right of way through their country to the Government, several, if not all, of the parties present as the pretended representatives of their respective tribes positively refused to grant it, and stated that their tribes would not consent to any such arrangement. I have been told so by parties present at the making of these treaties, and I have heard the same thing from other reliable sources. Why, sir, the Secretary of the Interior has suspended the work on one of the wagon roads, passing through the country occupied by these same Indians, long since these treaties were signed and sealed and received in this city. The work on the Cheyenne road, for the construction of which you made an appropriation at the last Congress, has been suspended by the order of this officer. When asked for the cause of this suspension his reply was that the commissioners must go up and make arrangements with the Indians before the work on the road could go on.

Now, sir, what does this all mean? Why is it, if these are valid treaties, made in good faith, if they are what they profess to be, that one of our wagon roads, the right of way for which these treaties declare has been acquired, has been stopped in the process of its construction? Certainly it is not for want of funds, for it was more than one half completed last year, with an abundance of money on hand to finish the work this year. Do not the same objections apply to the Niobrara road? Does it not pass through the country occupied by Indians who were parties to these same treaties? Certainly it does, and yet the provisions of every one of these treaties are precisely alike. But your Secretary allows the work on that road to go on. The completion of the Cheyenne road at an early day is of the greatest importance, not only to Dakota Territory, but also to Montana, Idaho, and Minnesota.

There has been something in the course which the Secretary of the Interior has pursued in relation to all of our affairs in Dakota that is beyond my apprehension, and which I cannot account for upon the hypothesis that he is the straightforward, upright, model of Christian civilization which he claims to be. He sends these treaties into the Senate for confirmation, as a fact accomplished, and he sends them in there after having been told by unmistakable authority that they are not a fact accomplished, that the right of way has not been acquired. These treaties, it is true, grant the right of way upon their face. After they are made and submitted to him, he orders a suspension of work on a wagon road which is provided for by law. Had he any information to justify a suspension of work on this road when he issued his order to that effect? If he had, why were the treaties sent in for ratification? For they were not sent in until after the order for the suspension of the work on the road was issued. When asked again why this work is suspended, he replies "that it is only temporary," and until the commissioners can go up and satisfy the Indians. But, sir, if the right of way is really acquired by the Government, where, I ask, is the necessity of doing more?

Again, if the suspension of work on this road is only temporary, why has this public officer, in utter violation of a plain act of Congress, stopped this work and required the superintendent of the Cheyenne road to turn over all the money and effects which Congress appropriated expressly for the construction of this particular road, and no other, into the hands of the superintendent of the Niobrara road?

I hope, sir, that the money asked for by the Indian Commissioner for the making of treaties will not be supplied, and that there will not be another dollar appropriated from the Treasury for any purpose connected with the Indian service except what may be absolutely necessary to fulfill valid treaty obligations now made, until some satisfactory plan is adopted which looks to the settlement of all of our Indian difficulties, and to their removal and permanent location away from the great national lines of travel and the mining district of the country. At the making of these treaties the few irresponsible Indians already mentioned met this mixed commission, made up as it was of warriors, sages, and saints, and welcomed them with their usual "How," and after a tedious palavering pow-wow they promised just as much, and only just as much, as was necessary to enable them to get possession of the presents and provisions taken up by the commission, for which you appropriated a large sum of money two years ago. They touched the pen and strutted up and down the banks of the Missouri with a feeling of consciousness that they had been as successful in obtaining an advantage over the Government in a peaceful negotiation with its commissioners as they had been in the three years' war just ended. Certainly no one will be foolish enough to suppose that a treaty made by a few indolent, irresponsible members of these large warlike tribes—and without the participation and consent of the majority—who could know nothing of the character of the stipulations made to bind their whole people, would be likely to result in anything permanent or peaceful. In no case have the thousands of hostile savages who have thus been the subjects of formal bribery, to pacify and conciliate them, maintained friendly relations with the Government for a respectable period of time. The whole affair is preposterously chimerical—a delusion, a cheat, and a fraud—and no disinterested person will have the audacity to advocate its respectability; and the sooner Congress understands it the better it will be for the people of our western Territories and the Treasury of the nation.

gross understands it the better it will be for the people of our western Territories and the Treasury of the nation.

What the Northwest wants, and what it has a right to expect of the Government, is such a treaty with our Indian tribes as will insure a permanent and lasting peace. We want a state of things brought about which will give us security—protection to our property, our firesides, and our lives; so that when we lie down at night, to rest from the labors of the day, there will be no danger to be feared that our stock will be stolen, our buildings fired, and our wives and children outraged and butchered before morning; that when we are traveling across the broad plains or up and down the rivers we need not fear the ambush and all the terrors of the rifle-shot, the tomahawk, and the scalping-knife of the savage. Sir, we have a right not only to expect this protection, but to demand it. The interest of the whole country demands that means be devised for the making and enforcing of such treaties as will effectually give that peace and security to the pioneer citizens of the Territories required for their permanent settlement and civilization. That the right of way through the great West, the working of its rich mines, the cultivation of its fertile acres, and the speedy development of the resources of that chosen region, should be held in check and under the control of its nomadic savages, is a reproach upon the Government for which there is no apology. How long would such a condition of things be tolerated in the most sparsely populated district of any State in the Union?

In my opinion—gentlemen may take it for what it is worth—the most practicable plan for permanent results in settling the Indian question is the collection, removal, and consolidation of the remnants of the Indian tribes, which I am confident do not now number more than two hundred and fifty thousand in the whole country. I would locate those north of the Arkansas river and east of the summit of the Rocky mountains in the Northwest, and those south of the Arkansas and east of the mountains in the extreme Southwest. There is no difficulty in finding a district of country which is peculiarly suited to their wants, and which is remote from the country now demanded by enterprising young men of our northern States.

After a careful survey of this whole matter—having given it much study—I introduced into this House on the 9th of January last a resolution which looks to this end, and which I now desire to read:

Whereas the time has arrived when the interests of the country, and the protection of the lives and property of many of our people, demand the removal of the various Indian tribes from the rich mineral lands of our northwestern Territories, and their permanent location in a section of country where they can remain unmolested, and subsist upon the game of the prairies; and whereas it is of the greatest importance to both our white population and the Indians that such location for their future abode be as remote as possible from the mining districts and great public thoroughfares of the Northwest, and at the same time in a section of country that is adapted to agriculture, and affords the greatest natural resources for the support of an Indian population, and where ample protection to the Indians and white population of our frontiers can be afforded by the Government:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by treaty for the early removal of all the Sioux tribes (except the Yanktons) together with the Gros Ventres, Mandans, Arikarees, Assiniboines, and Crows from the mineral lands of the northwestern Territories, and for their location upon that part of Dakota and Montana Territories lying within the following described boundaries, namely: beginning on the line which separates the United States from the British possessions on the ninety-eighth degree of west longitude, thence south to the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude, thence east to the Medicine Knob river, thence down said river to the Missouri river, thence up the left bank of the Missouri river to Plum Island, thence west to the western boundary line of Dakota Territory to the point where it is intersected by the south line of Montana Territory, thence west along the south line of Montana Territory to Powder river, thence down Powder river to the Yellowstone river, thence down the Yellowstone river to the Missouri river, thence up the left bank of the Missouri river to the one hundred and sixth degree of west longitude, thence north to the line of the British possessions, thence east to the place of beginning; and for the purpose of making said treaty the sum of $150,000 be appropriated; and until such a treaty is made and ratified, and the said Indians shall be removed and located upon the above-described territory, no more moneys shall be paid to them or expended for their benefit by the United States, other than to redeem the pledges (if any were made) by the commissioners sent to treat with said Indians in 1865.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. BURLEIGH] one question. He has referred to the treaties which he says were made by the commissioners last fall; and he has also adverted to the Government agents who have been sent there for the purpose of disbursing the funds which are to be expended under these treaties. I will now ask the gentleman whether a friend of his, appointed upon his own recommendation, has not been appointed an agent to disburse the funds under these treaties, and is not now there acting as the agent of those Indians with whom these treaties were made?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HUBBARD] to whom he alludes.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I refer to Mr. Hansom.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Hansom was appointed by President Lincoln to take the place of Major Latta, who was appointed some four years ago, but his commission was withheld for some unaccountable cause, by some influence here which I knew nothing about. I solicited the President to issue that commission and let him go out there, as it had been intended by the President he should go when he appointed him. And he is there, I believe, but not to disburse any funds, there being no money paid to the Indians under his charge.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Is he not there as the agent of the Two Kettle band, the Black Feet band, the Yanktonai band, and the Brule band of the Sioux Indians, with whom the commissioners made treaties, and which treaties the gentleman has denounced here on this occasion?

Mr. BURLEIGH. He was not appointed by Mr. Lincoln to go up there on account of these treaties, or anything of the kind. His commission was made out before these treaties were ever made.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. But he is still there as the agent of these Indians.

Mr. BURLEIGH. He is there.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. He is a man appointed on the recommendation of the gentleman from Dakota.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The recommendation was made by me and the commission was issued more than a year ago, but it was withheld, as I said before, for some reason that never was made known to me.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. That makes no difference. The gentleman has referred to the agent of the Government who has been sent there for the purpose of taking care of these Indians, and has indirectly denounced that gentleman. I have shown here, from the gentleman's own admissions, that that agent is a man of his own selection and recommendation.

Mr. BURLEIGH. In reply to that I will say I have made no such allusion at all. I have not alluded to Mr. Hansom, or to the agent who has been sent up there to take charge of these Indians, but to the men who were sent up there to make these bogus treaties.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Then I would like to ask the gentleman another question. He says he referred to the commissioners on the part of the Government to make these treaties. I would ask the gentleman who composed that commission. Was not General Sibley, of Minnesota, one of those commissioners?

Mr. BURLEIGH. He was.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. And Major General Curtis, of Iowa, was another.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. And Governor Edmunds, of his own Territory, was another.

Mr. BURLEIGH. He was another.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. And Rev. Mr. Reed was another; Mr. Guernsey, of Wisconsin, another, and Mr. Taylor, the Indian agent of Nebraska, was another. I would ask the gentleman if all of these men are not men of the highest respectability, men who have occupied high and prominent positions?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I am not going to raise any question in regard to the respectability of the gentlemen who went there to negotiate those treaties. It is not for me to call their character in question here. But I will say, for the information of the gentleman and the House, that when I came down through that Territory last fall, one of the members of the commission told me that at least seven of those treaties were not sufficiently signed to justify their ratification. I so stated to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; I so stated to the Secretary of the Interior. I told them precisely the condition of things, as I understood it; but for some reason the treaties were sent to the Senate, and I suppose they are now to be regarded as valid treaties.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I will ask the gentleman whether that matter was not fully investigated by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs; whether that committee did not hear an argument from the gentleman himself—a written argument—upon this subject; and whether the whole case was not canvassed by that committee and by the Senate before those treaties were confirmed.

Mr. BURLEIGH. In reply to the gentleman, I will say that I do not know anything about that. I did send to the Senate committee a written communication setting forth the facts, and showing that the greater portion of those treaties had not been, as I thought, sufficiently signed to justify their ratification. The Senate, I presume, thought otherwise. What information that body had to act upon is more than I know.

But, sir, I resume: this method of providing for our Indian population and relieving the people of our frontiers has been recommended by persons who have had much experience with these people as the surest and most economical method of relieving the country from further difficulty with them. Most certainly some plan should be adopted and carried into effect which looks to the accomplishment of such a result.

Mr. Speaker, I am not ambitious of originating the plan, but I do want these Indian troubles settled. I want this book of wrongs, of outrage and blood, closed, never to be opened again. I know that this plan will be objected to upon the ground that it will cost too much, but that is not a tenable objection, viewed in the glaring light of the millions upon millions squandered in the Indian service, and the sufferings which it will alleviate. If this thing is done at once, so far from being expensive, it will be a bold stroke of economy, that will wipe out the prodigal extravagance of the Indian department. It will not cost as much to treat with the Sioux Indians of Dakota, Montana, and the adjoining Territories, remove them into the above described country, and keep them as long as an Indian exists, embalm and monument them when dead, as it does to support the military establishment in guarding our borders in times of trouble and garrisoning our western posts for twelve months. The bare interest of that amount will treat with them, remove and subside them upon their reservations without using one dollar of the principal. I will take the contract to do all this for what it has cost the Government to support its military operations there during the last year. In addition to this we get possession of all the mineral lands of the Northwest and prevent the hundreds of murders and the wholesale massacres which these Indians commit every year upon our unprotected citizens and settlements. Why is it that more than one third of our national domain is to-day held by less than two hundred and fifty thousand savages?—that portion of our fair land, the latent wealth of which is more important to the great interests of this country and the liberty-loving home-seekers from the monarchical and despotic Old World than perhaps any other. I cannot reiterate this fact too often.

If there is one financial duty which should impress itself upon Congress at this time more forcibly than any other it is to make such a disposition of our Indian population as will promote the rapid settlement of our Territories. In no way can this be done so economically, so effectually, as in removing the Indians and the terrors of Indian wars from that country. Our citizens can then protect themselves as citizens do in the old States, by the civil arm of the Government. Emigrants will then flock to the remotest regions of the West and develop its vast resources, bring to light the hidden treasures of its mountains and valleys, and permanently establish throughout that entire section the free institutions of which we Americans so proudly boast, and to the enjoyment of which we have invited the oppressed of the civilized world.

Will some gentleman tell me what necessity there is for sending abroad for the large quantities of blankets, cloths, &c., for the use of our Indian tribes which are annually imported from England and paid for in gold? Are not American-manufactured blankets and cloths good enough for Indian use? We have to-day, in our own Government storehouses, going to waste, tens of thousands of blankets and hundreds of thousands of yards of cloth, all of which are manufactured in our own country for the use of our soldiers and sailors. Would it not be economy, sir, to use these articles now on hand rather than to import them from abroad and drain the gold out of the country to pay for them? Are not American-made blankets and cloths good enough for American Indians to wear? Is not the clothing manufactured for our own brave soldiers good enough for savages? Where is the wisdom or economy of sending abroad for foreign fabrics to clothe a set of Indian chiefs, while the officers of our Army are supplied from American looms? Is there a broader margin in dealing with wholesale importing merchants than with American manufacturers? If there is not, why have the boasted reformers who now have charge of our Indian affairs allowed this system to continue, a system which is so prejudicial to the interests of the country? Why, sir, the "Bay State" blankets, which are manufactured in Massachusetts, are far superior to any English Mackinack blankets that were ever brought across the ocean, and much cheaper. I have recently seen a sample of blankets manufactured in California which are superior to those imported for Indian use, at a cost of more than thirty per cent. less in paper than the English blankets cost in gold.

The same is true of all the cloths imported for Indian use. One yard of blue cloth, which is manufactured here for the use of our Army and Navy at a cost of less than one half what the English sewed-list cloth costs, is worth for actual use more than two yards of the imported article.

Mr. KELLEY. With the permission of the gentleman, I wish to ask him if he knows whether the department is now purchasing foreign or American blankets for the Indians.

Mr. BURLEIGH. If my information is correct, and I think it is, our Government has never supplied the Indians with any American blankets, unless when there was a short stock of foreign blankets in the market. I believe that it is the invariable custom of the Indian department to import from England the blankets for the use of the Indians.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman know whether the blankets supplied to the Indians this year are of American or English make?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I was told by a wholesale merchant in New York that he had the contract to furnish these blankets, and that he imported them from Europe. I was also told by another wholesale merchant that when he was in Europe he saw the manufactory where they were made. I have no other knowledge on the subject.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, I beg leave to say that when proposals for furnishing these blankets were advertised for, Mr. John Dobson, of Philadelphia, whose blankets enjoy a just pre-eminence in our markets, put in a bid or bids; that the contract was given to another; that Mr. Dobson exhibited to me copies of his bids and official statements of the bids on which the awards had been made, and demonstrated to me, as well as I could get at the result of the figures, that his had been the cheaper, and added that, as his object was to secure the Indian market for American manufacturers by producing a better than the foreign article, his blankets would all have been up to the standard. I know, too, the fact that Mr. Dobson makes blankets which were driving the best foreign blankets from our market by their superior excellence when our heavy war taxes gave English manufacturers advantages over him at his very doors.

What I assert is that he, with such motives to furnish standard blankets, did not get the contract, and that the middle-man who did get it applied to him to make the goods. I know further that at the time he made that exhibit to me the party to whom the contract had been awarded was treating with him to make the blankets; and he said to me, "Of course I will have to make them at a little lower rates than I would have done had I got the contract direct, for he must have a profit, and the Indians will get the blankets by so much inferior to those I offered to make for the Government." The blankets being delivered now, if that contract was concluded, and I believe it was, are made in my district by Mr. John Dobson at the falls of Schuylkill, and made inferior to what he would have delivered to the Government, because he is not bound to a Government standard and gets an inferior price from the contractor who got the contract over him. I put in one qualification to these assertions, which is, provided that contract was executed, for I have made no inquiry on the subject since then.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that some months ago I received a letter from a wholesale merchant in New York, who said he saw the blankets being manufactured in England for our Indians.

Mr. KELLEY. In what part of Europe are the falls of Schuylkill in the twenty-first ward of Philadelphia and fourth district of Pennsylvania? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLEIGH. I cannot say anything about that; it is not worth while.

I will say further, it was stated in that letter that a sample of those blankets had been sent to this country, and there was complaint that a large proportion of cotton entered into their manufacture. I am under the impression that the contractors have had these Indian blankets manufactured and imported from England. I think if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will introduce a resolution of inquiry into this House he will obtain that information from the Indian Bureau. I do not wish to do injustice to any one, but I still entertain the opinion expressed in the first place.

Mr. KELLEY. I will not say a resolution of inquiry will result in proving that some Indian blankets are made abroad, but I will say that such an inquiry will establish the facts I have asserted, that the contract was given for an inferior article at equal or higher rates to a man who went to a rejected bidder, John Dobson, of Philadelphia, and proposed to contract with him to manufacture the blankets of an inferior character and at an inferior rate so the contractor might make a profit out of his contract with the Government. Mr. Dobson's blanket factories are at the falls of the Schuylkill, twenty-first ward of Philadelphia. I do not think that is in Europe.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Speaker, I merely desire to know whether it is a crime in an officer of the Government to purchase foreign manufactured goods?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not say it is a crime to purchase foreign goods. I heard the gentleman from Dakota state that the blankets for the Indians were made in Europe. I thought it a pity that announcement should go to the country without qualification. I will ask my friend whether he does not think it is a crime, though it may not be a statutory one—a crime against morals; a crime against the Indians; a crime against the Government—to give a contract to a political favorite at higher rates than another offered, and then to accept under that contract an inferior article made at an inferior price by one of the rejected bidders?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the inquiry of the gentleman when he answers mine. I desire to know whether or not he insists a Government officer shall purchase articles of American manufacture exclusively.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not made such an intimation. That question was not in point. I was only correcting the gentleman's statement in reference to these blankets being made abroad.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand we walked daily upon a carpet purchased abroad by one of our officers.

Mr. KELLEY. That is true, and if we do not soon diminish our internal taxes and revise our tariff bill we will soon be walking in nothing but foreign-made clothes, under foreign umbrellas, and in foreign-made shoes.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that if a public officer gives a political favorite a contract at a higher rate than that of another bidder he does commit a crime, and ought to be punished. I do not understand the gentleman to say these blankets were taken at a higher rate than was bid by his friend.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not made the positive assertion that the blankets for this year were made by Mr. Dobson. What I say is that Mr. Dobson laid before me his bids and the report of lettings presented to him from the Indian Office, and that his calculations and mine showed that his bid was lower than that upon which the contract had been awarded.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would ask the gentleman if he knows that these blankets were manufactured in Philadelphia.

Mr. KELLEY. I repeat again, the last time I was in Mr. Dobson's establishment he was about concluding a contract, and he said, "Of course I do not contract with the Government, and cannot make blankets of the quality I was ready to furnish to the Government. I was anxious to prove that I could excel in Mackinaw blankets, as I do in others, and would have done it, but I am about contracting with an individual for blankets of an inferior character at a less price, and the contractor with the Government will pocket the difference. The Government will not know me in the transaction, or even know that I make the blankets."

Mr. BURLEIGH. But still, sir, this system goes on, and will go on until there is a revolution in this whole concern. Untold millions have been expended under our present miserably managed Indian system, and all without any important change in the condition of the Indian or benefit to the Government, but on the contrary, wrong, violence, and bloodshed have been the legitimate fruits of such a policy. Not one new idea has been developed nor a single practical result accomplished. "How to do it, and how not to do it," seems to be the standing order of the Indian institution.

The country which I have described as a suitable and permanent location for the Indians is sufficiently large to support all the tribes north of the Arkansas and east of the Rocky mountains. It is well adapted to the wants of a large Indian population with an abundance of land suited to cultivation, and it is the great game region of the United States.

The removal and final settlement of our northwestern Indians in this proposed reservation would enable us to open the entire body of mineral lands east of the Rocky mountains, relieve our overland emigration from Indian dangers and annoyances, and place the red men where they could live and die unmolested by the enterprise of the white man, and under the protecting arm of the Government. But I am satisfied that no such grand results will be realized so long as Congress contents itself with reading the reports of interested Secretaries and Commissioners—officers who would starve upon their salaries living as they do, but who thrive immeasurably upon the more questionable perquisites of their offices.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman to explain what he means by speaking of interested Secretaries and other officers.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Well, sir, I do not desire to take the time now to discuss this matter, but I have information in my possession which, if the gentleman desires it, I will lay before Congress, so that he can weigh and examine it himself.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is simply for the purpose of understanding the matter. I suppose that the gentleman intended to convey the idea that the Secretary and the head of the departments having control of Indian affairs were interested in the contract.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Perhaps not in this contract particularly; but it is generally understood that there are certain perquisites attached to the office of Secretary as well as that of Commissioner.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not intend to defend any wrongful act committed by any member of this Government; but what I desire is, when the gentleman is dealing in charges of this kind, that he shall make them plain and specific. That is what I insist upon.

Mr. BURLEIGH. If I can get a resolution adopted by the House I will endeavor to gratify the gentleman's curiosity before the close of the session.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is not curiosity; I merely ask the gentleman to so deal with this question when he connects these insinuations with public officers, as to allow us to understand just what he means to say.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I mean just what I say.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, he has not said very much; it is mere intimation, more by the way of innuendo than anything else, and I would like to have the gentleman make a charge specific.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would rather not be interrupted.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say that in all the intercourse I had with the party to whom I have referred about blankets there was nothing that led me to suppose for one moment that the Secretary of the Interior had any cognizance of the transactions that were going on. The allegations were made against the officer of the Indian Bureau, who had the duty of contracting for Army blankets. And if, from any remarks I have made, the inference is drawn that I know any reason why I should sympathize with the reflections upon the Secretary of the Interior just indulged in by the gentleman from Dakota, I beg leave to dispel it. There was nothing that came to my knowledge that in any way reflected upon him.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the gentleman have additional time enough to finish his speech.

No objection being made, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Why, sir, how can the country expect pure waters to flow from a corrupt fountain? How can you expect an honest administration of your public affairs by an officer of the Government who will come upon the floor of this House and sacrifice every principle of truth and honor for the purpose of carrying a measure which, under other circumstances, would be considered a fraud and a cheat upon the Government?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I want to know distinctly whether the gentleman charges upon the Secretary of the Interior fraud and corruption in this matter.

Mr. BURLEIGH. If the gentleman will make a note of such things as he desires to inquire about, and put his questions after I get through, I will answer them.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. The gentleman seems to be an adept in dealing in innuendoes that you cannot put your finger upon, that you cannot touch. I want some distinct assertion from him if he has any to make.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Well, I will tell the gentleman, at the commencement of this session there was an appropriation of $500,000 asked for the support of certain Indian tribes. I had been told by a gentleman here that the moneys had already been expended, and that it was really a deficiency they were asking for, and I so told the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. STEVENS.] In the course of a day or two I was called upon in this very Hall by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. He came in here and took a seat by me, and spoke of the necessity of having that appropriation to sustain those Indians. I told him what I had been told by parties who claimed to know, that a large amount of the money had already been expended. He told me that not a dollar of it had been expended; that he had no authority to expend any money before it was appropriated. And he asked me to use my influence; of course I had not much influence, but what little I had, I used, to get the appropriation through. I again saw the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. STEVENS,] and told him that I thought there must be some misapprehension in regard to the matter. I went to work and did what I could, and the appropriation was passed. I subsequently learned that this money had been expended before it was appropriated. I stated to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs what I knew when the nomination of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs was pending before them. And he denied it in a most flat-footed manner, and said that he had never asked me to take any part in the matter, and said that it was simply absurd.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. One other question. Are these the facts upon which the gentleman bases his charge of fraud and corruption against the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I am not speaking of the Secretary of the Interior. If the gentleman had paid attention to my remarks for the last few sentences, he would have discovered that.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Perhaps he did not refer to the Secretary of the Interior in the last sentences, for he was then replying to my question.

Mr. BURLEIGH. It is high time, sir, if statesmen legislate for this Government, and not for favored individuals, that they look to this matter, and do not allow important measures to pass Congress until satisfied of their necessity and justice.

It will be but a few days before you are called upon to appropriate another large sum, (I learn near one million dollars) for the payment of supplies professed to have been used in support of southwestern Indians, under what are called starvation contracts, although I believe the law strictly forbids expending money in advance of its appropriation. It would be well for the country if Congress would appoint a committee to investigate the transactions of the Indian Office for the last nine months—a committee which is not to be frightened at the cart loads of documents usually arrayed as a bulwark of defense by that office whenever an investigation into its affairs is sought; but who will boldly, honestly, and justly unriddle the sphinx. Such an Œdipus is certainly needed, and I hope that such a committee will be appointed, unless the present investigating committee will take this matter in charge. If my information is correct, and I have no reason to doubt it, the affairs of the concern, notwithstanding the puffing and blowing, (paid for, I presume,) will show a condition of things which can only exist in a close corporation, under a united head, where incompetency and assurance appear to have full sway, and where the Lilliputian scepter of the establishment is wielded by its mandarin with an assumption of authority that would dwarf the pretensions of a Camanche chief or a Patagonian prince.

Another great cause of difficulty which attends the management of our Indian affairs is a want of accurate information by Congress concerning the true condition of the Indians. The men who are sent into the Indian country as agents to take charge of and manage the affairs of our numerous Indian tribes go there trammelled with the arbitrary rules of the office here, by which their usefulness is to a greater or less extent destroyed. The agents who are on the spot, who live with the Indians, are the only persons capable of judging what course of action should be pursued in the management of their respective tribes. But this cannot be; a haughty Commissioner in this city undertakes to direct in the smallest transactions for a tribe of Indians located two thousand miles distant, not a solitary member of which he has ever seen. I will take the case of the Yanktons. They made a treaty by which the United States agreed to pay them the sum of $65,000 per year for a given number of years. Now, sir, neither these Indians nor their agent who lives with them is allowed to control the expenditure of this money for the use of the tribe. Why is it?

I cannot account for this extraordinary conduct in any other way than that it is a very great pleasure for him to make very large purchases, with a very broad margin, to supply the wants of the Indian service. No man is capable of controlling our Indian relations as they should be unless he thoroughly understands the habits of life, the wants, and the actual necessities of these people.

But we are told that Indian agents are not competent to do these things. How many agents do you suppose there are in the service of the Government to-day, and under the sole control of the Commissioner, who are not his equals in ability to discharge the duties of his office? Again, we are told that Indian agents will steal, that they are not to be trusted. I have no idea that Indian agents are much more honest than Commissioners, Secretaries, or other public officers, but I venture the assertion that they will compare favorably with any other body of public servants in this particular.

But there are other and more reprehensible transactions of this department of the Government to which I desire to call the attention of Congress and the country; transactions which are in violation of every principle of equity, repugnant to the honest impulses of human nature, and which involve the lives and property of our citizens.

In the year 1862 the Sioux Indians in Minnesota, in violation of their treaty obligations with the United States, revolted and treacherously murdered near a thousand unprotected men, women, and children in that State. Who does not remember the thrill of horror which sickened every heart in the land as the intelligence of those acts of brutality and barbarism fell upon the ears of our people? The whole western frontier of Minnesota was depopulated, and as these red murderers were forced westward into Dakota by the brave citizen soldiery of that State, in the defense of their homes and firesides, our people fled for safety and left the Territory almost without inhabitants.

In 1863 the Government decided to remove from Minnesota all the remaining Sioux Indians. Some five hundred of them who had been captured and condemned to death for their participation in the late massacre were imprisoned at Davenport, Iowa, where they were kept under strong military guard, while the rest of them were removed to Dakota at a point on the Missouri river about one hundred and fifty miles above the capital of that Territory. Neither the personal safety nor the pecuniary interests of our people were consulted in this transaction. If they had been, there would have been but one voice, and that would have been a united exclamation of disapprobation. They would have entered their solemn protest against the location of these Indians, even thus far above the friendly Yanktons, and more than fifty miles above our frontier military posts.

The result of this business has been the expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars of Government funds, and the cold-blooded murder of many of our best citizens who have fallen before the fatal rifle of these same savages. Whole families of our people have been slaughtered. Husbands, wives, fathers, mothers, sons, and daughters, neither age nor helpless infancy have been spared by these bloody Sioux fiends of Minnesota, who were so heartlessly forced upon our people by one foolish and inconsiderate act of Government, the inhuman audacity of which would have disgraced the meanest mandates of the Bey of Tunis or the Dey of Algiers.

I would to God, that this were the last chapter of wrongs which is to be recorded on the fair pages of the unwritten history of our exposed and neglected frontiers, in the blood of our best citizens. But I greatly fear that such is not to be the case.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. To what does the gentleman now allude; to the removal of the Indians from Minnesota to Dakota?

Mr. BURLEIGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. When was that done?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I have just stated.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Was that done under the administration of James Harlan, as Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I stated distinctly that it was done in 1863.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Then, in his present remarks, the gentleman does not refer to the present Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I say that in 1863 the Government made this removal.

But a few weeks since an order was issued, from one of the Departments, for the release from prison of all these savages, whose hands have been dyed in the blood of so many hundreds of innocent and unoffending pioneers—the very bone and sinew of our infant States—and whose flinty, fiery hearts weak for blood and vengeance such only as fiends can feel and savages know.

That was in the reign of James Harlan, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I will ask the gentleman if he has not introduced a resolution in this House calling for information on that subject, and also directed a letter to the President upon the subject; and if his inquiries have not been fully and conclusively answered by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I will give all the facts to the House before I get through; so the gentleman need not anticipate me.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I will ask the gentleman if he did not himself advocate, in the presence of the Secretary of the Interior, the removal of these identical Indians he now refers to, down to the Missouri river, and their consolidation with the Yanktonai Sioux.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I state most distinctly that I never advocated anything of the kind. I did advocate the removal of the women and children with a view of wiping out the tribe. But I never apprehended for a moment that there was a man on earth who would advocate the turning loose into our community of two, three, or four hundred red-handed murderers and savages.

These are to join the rest of their tribe by the side of our settlements in Dakota. Like the former removal, your Secretary of the Interior and your Commissioner of Indian Affairs have intentionally concealed their operations from the community into whose very heart these murderers are to be thrust by their act; and it is only found out accidentally by their representatives here.

But this is not all. Officers of the Government have ordered the wholesale removal of all these savages from the place where they were first located on the Missouri to a point below the friendly tribes and more than thirty miles below the military posts established for the protection of our frontiers. The place selected for their new home is in one of the settled counties of northwestern Nebraska, contiguous to the settled portion of Dakota, and but a short distance above my own residence. But, we are asked, what is to become of these people? How are they to be disposed of? We know that they have been driven from their homes in Minnesota, where they were as comfortably situated as Indians could be. Is there no place for them? We are told by your Secretary of the Interior that they are peaceable, harmless, and inoffensive; that there is no danger to be apprehended from them. He says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 8, 1866.

SIR: In reply to your note of the 7th instant, I have the honor to state that by authority of an act of Congress, a reservation has been selected for the remnants of certain bands of Indians formerly residing in Minnesota, not previously removed, in the Territory of Nebraska; and that some of them have already been removed to it, and it is the intention of the Department, as soon as suitable provision can be made, to forward to them their wives and children.

In this connection it is proper to say that a very large majority of those Indians have been perfectly peaceable in their intercourse with the white inhabitants of Minnesota, and rendered great service to them in repelling attacks from hostile Indians, besides recovering and returning to their friends women and children who had been carried away as prisoners of war; and it is known that for the last four years those who previously had manifested hostility have conducted themselves in the most quiet and peaceable manner.

Under these circumstances I do not, therefore, apprehend danger from any future outbreak more than at any time may be expected from the unjust conduct of white people toward them. The reservation to which a part of them have been removed, and to which it is expected their women and children will be sent, was recommended by two of the most experienced officers of the Army; and civilians perfectly familiar with the character of these Indians personally inspected and reported favorably upon the fitness of the location named.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,
JAMES HARLAN,
Secretary.

Hon. W. A. BURLEIGH, House of Representatives.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Dakota whether or not these Indians have been removed; and if so, whether the order for their removal has not been issued by the President of the United States.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Oh, yes, sir; they have all been turned out, and sent down to my neighborhood.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Dakota whether or not this order has been issued by the President of the United States. I understand that he is the only officer who can issue such an order. Does the gentleman mean to attack the President?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I will answer the gentleman. I called upon the President of the United States in regard to the matter, and he seemed to know very little about it. He said he supposed he had signed an order of that kind; that his Cabinet officers were in the habit of bringing to him orders connected with their respective Departments; and that they told him what was necessary, and he signed the papers. "Well, Mr. President," said I, "I could not believe for one moment that you were aware of the cruelties which have been practiced upon our people; and I therefore rely upon you to correct this evil."

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he thinks that the President is in the habit of signing orders which he does not understand, and whether the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs could move one step, could make any progress whatever, toward the reremoval of these Indians without an order from the President.

Mr. BURLEIGH. In a matter of this kind, I presume, sir, that the President answers the purpose of one of these metallic franking stamps used by members of Congress, [laughter:] that whenever a document is taken to him by a Cabinet officer, or by the Commissioner, connected with his particular Department, the officer tells him that he has investigated the matter, and the President writes upon it "A. Johnson," taking it for granted that the matter is all honest and right.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Does the gentleman mean to insinuate that the President is simply a machine in the hands of the heads of the Departments?

Mr. BURLEIGH. Nothing of the kind, sir; but I suppose that when the President is satisfied, by the representations of his Cabinet officers, that a paper presented to him is right, especially if it is a long and voluminous document, he affixes his name, relying on their good faith and assurances.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Why, then, does not the gentleman level the thunderbolts of his wrath against the President, and not against the head of the Interior Department?

Mr. BURLEIGH. For the very reason that the President has a confidential clerk, in the person of the Secretary of the Interior, to whom he has intrusted these matters, and who, he has every reason to believe, from the position he occupies, will discharge the duties of his position faithfully and honestly. But I take it for granted he will not labor under that misapprehension much longer.

But, sir, I go on with the line of remark in which I was interrupted.

Now, sir, if this statement is true, I ask you why it is that these people were driven en masse from that State by its indignant and outraged citizens. Why were they forced to abandon their homes, their comfortable dwellings, and rich lands there if this assertion be correct? This statement of the Secretary of the Interior cannot be true, but is intended to deceive and mislead the people into whose midst he has been instrumental in forcing these savages. Here is an extract from his report to the President of December 4, 1865:

"It is difficult to maintain peaceful relations with the Indians in Minnesota. The terrible massacre of the white inhabitants in the year 1862 is fresh in the memory of the country. The intense exasperation which followed led in that State to a policy, which has also prevailed to some extent in several of our organized Territories, inducing a personal predatory warfare between the frontier citizens, emigrants, and miners, and isolated bands of Indians belonging, in many instances, to tribes at peace with the Government. This awakens a spirit of retaliation, inciting atrocious acts of violence, which, oft repeated, result in irreparable disasters to both races."

The Secretary states in his communication to me which I have just read, "and it is known that for the last four years those Indians who had previously manifested hostility have conducted themselves in the most quiet and friendly manner." What does the Secretary mean by this assertion, if it be not to deceive and mislead the public mind? If he knows anything at all of the history of these Indians, he knows that it has not been four years since the massacre in Minnesota occurred. This being the case, what credit can attach to his official statement? He cannot be unmindful of the fact that it was in August, 1862, that these same Indians, whom he has turned over as a Christian legacy to our people, commenced and completed the most gigantic cold-blooded work of death and desolation that ever befell an American State—less than four years ago, during which period he says these savages, "who had previously manifested hostility have conducted themselves in the most friendly manner." Why does not this gentleman, holding the responsible position which he does in the Government, state facts as they are known to exist, and say to the country that these identical savages, "who have been so peaceable for the last four years," have been confined in prison under a strong military guard—the sentence of death having been passed upon them for their complicity in that terrible work of blood? He knows that during the fall of 1862 and the winter following, as well as in spring, summer, and fall of 1863, scarcely a week passed that the exposed settlers of our frontiers were not murdered and robbed by the members of the bands who were driven from Minnesota. And our citizens are still exposed to and suffering from the depredations of these same Indians.

Why does not the Secretary or the Commissioner state for the information of the country that these are the same Indians who committed the cold-blooded murder of forty-seven innocent, unprotected citizens at Spirit Lake, in northwestern Iowa, in the year 1857; and that in the spring of 1855 these humble, repentant, harmless Sioux murderers, who, in the language of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in a late report to the President, "have atoned for their crimes as no people have ever made atonement before," returned to Minnesota, and almost within sight of Mankato, murdered in cold blood a whole family, consisting of seven members?

Instead of concealing the truth in relation to these important matters, why do not these public officers openly declare it, and not try to lull our people into a state of fatal apathy until they are again aroused by the recurrence of those terrible scenes of carnage through which they have been compelled to pass during the last nine years?

If any gentleman thinks that I have overdrawn the horrors of the scenes of suffering which I have described which have befallen the inhabitants of our frontiers, I will call upon the loyal and patriotic Senators and Representatives from Minnesota to correct me. Let them speak; let the people of their State speak also.

Now, sir, I ask what all this means? Will any rational person pretend to say that there is not a direct conflict in the meaning and in the language of these two communications? Had the Secretary forgotten the contents of his report to the President when he addressed me the foregoing communication, or did he suppose that I was ignorant of the former when he sent me the latter? When before in the history of this Government has a Cabinet officer assumed the responsibility of manufacturing and perverting history to suit his own necessities? Is not the fact of the terrible massacre in Minnesota in the summer of 1862 as patent to all as is that of the great rebellion through which the nation has just passed? Can the special pleading of any officer of the Government for special purposes blind the eyes and numb the sensibilities of either Congress or the nation to that terrible reality which watered the soil of half a State with tears and dyed its green fields with the blood of its citizens?

But I assert that there is no authority of law for this last removal and location of these Indians. The act of March 3, 1863, which gives the only authority for their removal, had already been exhausted. If it were still in force, the location of these Indians at the mouth of the Niobrara, would not come within its provisions. The act provides that the selection of a reservation for their abode shall be upon "unoccupied land;" that it shall consist of "good agricultural land." Let me read the language of the act:

"That the President is authorized, and hereby directed, to assign to and set apart for the Sisseton, Wahpaton, Medawakanton, and Wahpakoota bands of Sioux Indians, a tract of unoccupied land outside of the limits of any State, sufficient in extent to enable him to assign to each member of said bands (who are willing to adopt the pursuit of agriculture) eighty acres of good agricultural lands, the same to be well adapted to agricultural purposes."

The tract which has been selected at Niobrara is not of this character. All, or nearly all of the land upon the four townships which have been withdrawn from market for these Indians, that is suited to agriculture, has been sold by the Government, and is now held by private individuals, except the town site of Niobrara, which is owned by a company. All of the desirable bottom lands, those suited to cultivation, are owned and many of them occupied by the citizens of the country. They can only be possessed by the Government by purchase, and there is no authority given for acquiring a title to them by purchase. I have traveled over these lands and know what I say to be strictly true; and I assert that the Government land upon which these Indians are now being located is not so well adapted to agriculture as the lands at Crow Creek, the place whence they have just been removed.

As the removal and location of these Indians has been accomplished without authority of law, and since their condition will in no way be improved, while their location close by our white settlements will retard the settlement of that country, depreciate the value of both private and public property, and endanger the lives of our citizens, I must appeal to Congress for the removal of these savages to some other district of country, where the citizens of Dakota and northwestern Nebraska will be relieved from the evils of which they now so justly complain.

Again, I ask, if these Indians are peaceable and harmless, as is asserted, why not return them to their native State and locate them nearer their former homes, upon the fertile soil of Minnesota? An act of Congress authorizing the same is all that is required. Why force them so far from the homes of their childhood, from the graves of their fathers, into that inhospitable country where their sufferings cause so many heart-yearnings to this Christian philanthropist? Perhaps a more agreeable residence is desired for those self-sacrificing heralds of the cross who have such a fancy for savage associations.

There is no principle of law, I suppose, more firmly or incontrovertibly settled, than that a power of this sort once exercised under the law conferring it, is exhausted and gone forever—beyond all power of revocation. And this is as well the award of common reason as of the common law. Any other doctrine would involve the absurdity of converting a mere power of selection into a roving commission without limits and without end. If the first act of choice is not conclusive, a second would be no more so, and the title of the beneficiary would be at all times subject to the caprice of the donor, and would be in effect no title at all. Once vested by the selection, if divestible at all, it can be divested only through the power of the legislative act. But no man in his senses could well suppose that it was the intention of that power to lodge with anybody the privilege of shifting its grants ad libitum, and that, too, after large expenditures incurred in carrying them into effect.

If these Indians are not guilty of the terrible crimes of which they stand charged; if they are peaceable and friendly, safe members of society, where was the justice and humanity in depriving them of their former homes and property in Minnesota, as was done by a solemn act of Congress? Let me read from the act of February 16, 1863:

"Whereas the United States heretofore became bound by treaty stipulations to the Sisseton, Wahpaton, Medawakanton, and Wahpakoota bands of the Dakota or Sioux Indians to pay large sums of money and annuities, the greater portion of which remains unpaid according to the terms of said treaty stipulations; and whereas during the past year the aforesaid bands of Indians made an unprovoked, aggressive, and most savage war upon the United States, and massacred a large number of men, women, and children within the State of Minnesota, and destroyed and damaged a large amount of property, and thereby have forfeited all just claim to the said moneys and annuities to the United States; and whereas it is just and equitable that the persons whose property has been destroyed or damaged by the said Indians, or destroyed or damaged by the troops of the United States in said war, should be indemnified in whole or in part out of the indebtedness and annuities so forfeited as aforesaid: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all treaties heretofore made and entered into by the Sisseton, Wahpaton, Medawakanton, and Wahpakoota bands of Sioux and Dakota Indians, or any of them, with the United States, are hereby declared to be abrogated and annulled, so far as said treaties or any of them purport to impose any future obligation on the United States, and all lands and rights of occupancy within the State of Minnesota, and all annuities and claims heretofore accorded to said Indians, or any of them, to be forfeited to the United States."

How shall the Government answer to those of our citizens who mourn the loss of relations, and who have themselves, in many instances, been mangled and maimed by these savages, who have been turned loose upon them by its act? Will you vote for an appropriation to indemnify them for losses thus sustained? Will you see that a law is passed to pay them for their property which has been stolen and destroyed by these Indians? Are not the people of our Territories entitled to protection as citizens of our common country? Have they not the same claim upon you which they had as citizens of their respective States before leaving those States? If they are, why not extend it to them, and not allow an executive officer of the Government to collect from the remote frontiers and from the prisons of the States several thousand heartless, blood-thirsty savages, and precipitate them into the very heart of our settlements, without a word of warning or effort to protect us.

If, then, there is no legal authority for this act of the Secretary, it is due to our citizens that the Government extend to them immediate relief.

Now, sir, with the record of the past before our eyes, embellished with all the horrors of the terrible massacre in Minnesota, unparalleled as it was in savage ferocity, staring us in our faces, with the bleaching bones of our own murdered citizens unburied, scattered broadcast over our "chosen land," and while our friends are yet clothed with the emblems of mourning for their butchered relatives who have fallen before the fatal blow of the relentless savage, making a gory foreground to the appalling picture, can you wonder that I appeal to Congress, in the name of the citizens of Dakota, in the name of humanity, to close this infernal book of crime by some earnest, effective legislation, and save our people from the dangers which now surround them, and avert the storm-cloud of death and devastation which hangs over our defenseless Territory?

I ask you, sir, if we were not invited to Dakota by the Federal Government? Were we not promised the protection of its strong arm? Have we not established our homes, built our dwellings, located our families there, and become law-abiding citizens of that Territory? We have done all these things. Our people have gone there from every free State of this Union from Maine to Oregon; they have selected Dakota as their permanent dwelling place and are there toiling with a will in the soil of its rich prairies to lay the foundations broad and deep of a future State, which they hope will, at no distant day, lend a mighty strength in the perpetuation of the eternal principles of liberty and justice.

Will you give us that protection which the magnitude of our undertaking demands? Then for bread do not give us a stone; for a fish do not give us a serpent. For our security do not send us the savage, whose hands are wreaking with the blood of our citizens, and whose hunting shirt is decorated with the scalp-locks of our murdered wives and daughters.

It is not a pleasure for me to question the motives or censure the conduct of any public officer of this Government, and I assure you that I should not do so on this occasion if there was any other method by which I could possibly procure relief from the personal and political wrongs which are now being inflicted upon the people of Dakota, and the adjoining Territory, by the officers who have control of our Indian affairs. Had the Secretary of the Interior notified the citizens of Dakota and northwestern Nebraska or their representatives in advance of his action, that the Government intended locating these hostile Indians in their very midst, by an act of arbitrary, despotic power, which action, I am sorry to say, was by him veiled in secrecy, they would at least have had an opportunity to remonstrate against this heartless transaction. As it is, our citizens have but the alternative either to submit to this great wrong, which will endanger life, depreciate property, and rob them of that happiness which security alone affords, abandon the country, or pursue the manly course which the gallant sons of Minnesota adopted, and with the approbation of the Government, too, and drive this band of black-hearted murderers out of the country.

The citizens of Dakota are loyal and love the free institutions of our common country. They have yielded a willing obedience to its laws; they are from every free State of the Union; they are your kinsmen as well as mine. Many of them fought to sustain the flag of their fathers upon the hardest-contested battle-fields of the late war. They recognize the supremacy of the Federal Constitution and laws over all other human laws; but when you say to them that you have a right to make and execute a law or an arbitrary order which deprives them of the fruits of their labor without compensation, and which endangers the safety and happiness of their families, by setting down in their midst several hundred savages who dance and sing around the dangling scalps of their own wives and children, who are as near and dear to them as the ties of nature can bind them, and who exultingly boast of the robbery, rapine, and murder which they have committed upon their kindred, you will be met with that scorn and contempt which such heartless cruelty and neglect so justly merits, by that high-toned spirit of manly resistance which true patriotism has never failed to make in defense of home and kindred, of liberty and justice, and which the Almighty Author of our being has established as the true and unmistakable standard of unadulterated manhood.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, obtained the floor. Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. With the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, I desire to say that I may not have fully understood the purport of the various statements which have been made by the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. BURLEIGH] in the speech which he has just concluded. If, on examining that speech, I shall find it to contain anything which in my judgment may call for a reply, I shall on some future occasion reply to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CLARKE] to yield to me for a short time.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I will yield to the gentleman for ten minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am not very well informed as to the manner in which the Indian affairs of this Government have been conducted, but I have been long of the opinion that the Indians have been quite as much "sinned against as sinning." I am very glad the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. BURLEIGH] has taken this occasion to bring to the attention of the House what he regards as abuses in the management of the Indian affairs of the Government.

I have no disposition to defend any one against any charges which may be well founded. It is not my purpose to-day to enter upon the defense of any person whatever. I desire to give the House a little more information on the subject of our Indian affairs; not, sir, that I am personally cognizant of the facts, but I have a statement of an Indian chief which I desire to have put in the possession of this House. It is not often that the red man has an opportunity to speak for himself. On this occasion he can have that opportunity.

I hold in my hand a speech made by a Yankton chief whose name in English is "the Man that was Struck by the Ree." He describes the conduct of Indian agents toward the Indians:

"Pa-la-ne-ape-po, or the Man that was Struck by the Ree, spoke as follows:

"My friend, you sent a letter to our agency requesting our (chief's) presence here. My friend, I have a good leg; it is sound; there are no sores upon it, and I want to go to Washington to see my Great Father. The reason I want to see my Great Father is, I desire to make my report to him in person, but the agents say if I go he will not pay any attention to me; that he is full of business with the whites. My belly is full of what I want to say to him. My friend, you are sent by my grandfather. I think you will do just as all the rest—make money. I should think my grandfather would want to see me to make my report in person.

"I cannot say much. The Great Spirit knows that I speak the truth; knows what I say."

That is the way he began; after awhile he spoke as follows:

"I would have to tell my grandfather that I made a treaty with him, and I would have to ask him how many goods he is going to give me; and I would tell him that I want him to give me the invoices of my goods, that I may know what I am entitled to. I do not want corn thrown to me the same as to hogs. If I could get my invoices I should always know what belongs to me. Every time our goods come I have asked the agent for the invoices, but they never show me the invoices; they can write what they please, and they go and show it to my grandfather, and he thinks it all right. I think, my friend, my grandfather tells me lies. My friend, what I give a man I don't try to take back. I think, my friend, there is a great pile of money belonging to us which we never yet have received.

"I think the Great Spirit hears what I say. When they bring the goods to the agency, my goods are all mixed up with the agent's goods; I can't tell my goods from the trader's goods. I think if you go to all the nations, you will not find any who has been used as I have been. My grandfather told me I should have a warehouse separate from the agents; he told me I should take one hundred and sixty acres of land for my own use, and that I should have plenty of land to raise hay for the stock. All the hay on my bottom land is cut by the white man to sell. I asked for hay, but I can get none—white man cut it; I can't tell who gets the money for the hay, but I think Redfield got some money for hay; my ponies can have no hay. I think, my friend, if you go up to my agency you will have a bad feeling; you will feel bad for me to see the situation I am in, and to see my buildings, after what my grandfather told me.

"The first agent was Redfield, and when he came there he borrowed blankets from me to sleep upon, and agreed to return them, but never did, though I asked for them. Goods have been stored up stairs in the warehouse, and have all disappeared; perhaps the rats eat them; I do not know what became of them. If they bring any goods for the Indians to eat and put them in the warehouse the agents live out of them, and the mess-house, where travelers stop, has been supplied from the Indians' goods, and pay has been taken by the agents, and they have put the money in their pockets and taken it away with them. I have seen them take the goods from the storehouse of the Indians and take them to the mess-house, and I have had to pay for a meal for myself at the mess-house, and so have others of our Indians had to pay for meals at the mess-house prepared from their own goods.

"I understand that the agents are allowed $1,500 per year for salary. I think $1,500 is not much—not more than enough to last a month, the way they live; they bring all their families there, and friends also. When the agents have been there one, two, and three years, their property increases—the goods in their house and their household furniture increase. When Redfield left the agency, a steamboat came in the night and took away fifteen boxes of goods, so that the Indians would not know it; but the Indians were too sharp for him. When Redfield came up he brought his nephew to be trader for the Indians; and one night he took a load of flour out of the shed where the Indians' flour was, and carried it to his store to sell out to the Indians. My friend, what I say about his taking the flour I did not see with my own eyes, but my young men came and told me so. Because I wanted the blankets that I loaned Redfield, he got mad and never answered me, and never gave me the blankets.

"My friend, a great many things have been going on, but they do them in the night, so as to blind me. What I say I see myself. After Redfield took away the fifteen boxes he sent back and took away more. I think all these young chiefs have eyes, the same as I, and that they have seen these things. I went down to Washington twice to see my grandfather, and the third time I went I came back by the Missouri. When I went down I saw many stores full of goods; the settlers come to our agency and make money and then go off. I think if we had two stores it would be better for us. If I had understood from what my grandfather told me, that I was to be treated as I have been, I would never have done as I have done; I never would have signed the treaty. Mr. Redfield said to me, 'When I am gone you will meet with a great many agents; but you will never meet one like me.' I think I never want to see one like him.

"When I made my treaty these young men (chiefs) were there, and my grandfather told me that the half-breeds should have some portion of the money. When I was making the treaty the half-breeds were all about me, my body was sweet, and my grandfather told me that I could give the money to any I pleased. These white men had Indian women for wives; and they came with their accounts against the Indians and gave them to Redfield. They told me if I would help them get the money I should always have plenty of money myself; they would always assist me. I told them I did not believe what they said; that if I should give them the money and should come into their house they would tell me to go out of their house. After I gave them the money they all scattered, and I cannot see them. After what I have done for them, given them the money, these white men have gone away and left their half-breed children for me to support and take care of. But when the agents come with money the white men come from every direction and get the money, and then go away and spend the money at groceries. I think after I have paid them so much they ought to treat me better. I do not want any more of the half-breed money paid Joseph Lionais, Eli Bedard, Charles Ruleoux, August Trovercier, John B. La Plant, Bruno Conover, Theophile Brugner, and Joseph Proux. The half-breeds that live with the Indians are poor, and I want the money that has been paid the above-named half-breeds retained hereafter and paid over to the tribe toward supporting the poor orphan children, but I do not know what has become of it. If the white men should get their money again they would spend it for whisky, and I want their shares of the money stopped. The reason I am saying this is, the white men and half-breeds, whom we did not provide for by treaty, are displeased with us because we did not give them a share of the money.

"Among our nations there are a great many tribes come every year. The Tetons and others come down, and sometimes steal horses, and then the white men lay it to the Yanktons, and come to us to get pay for the stolen horses because we have got a treaty. They came last fall with their claim for stolen horses to the agent, and the agent showed it to the interpreter, and he told the agent that the Indians who stole the horses did not belong to the Yanktons; and the whites said if we had another interpreter they could collect their claims. Our grandfather has given this young man, Charles Pecout, a medal and made him a chief."

"I am now done with the management of Agent Redfield and the half-breeds, and now commence upon other matters."

This is a speech delivered before a sub-committee of this House. So he continues in relation to these agents for some time. Next day he takes up the case of Agent Burleigh. I do not know whether it is the Delegate here.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I am the person.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Strike the Ree continues as follows:

"August 26.—My friend, yesterday we had a talk, and to-day we will commence with Mr. Agent Burleigh's agency. My grandfather, Mr. Redfield, the first agent, did not tell me the same things that my grandfather told me, neither did Agent Burleigh, but both of them told me lies; they filled my belly with lies. Everybody has got a copy of the treaty I made with my grandfather, I suppose. I suppose you are sent by my grandfather to represent the great council. I am here to represent my great council. The money my grandfather sent me has been thrown away. You know who threw it away. The guns, ammunition, wagons, horses, and everything have been thrown away. I can tell who threw them away. The reason the whites have trouble with the Indians is on account of the agents. When the goods come they are not according to the treaty. They never fulfill the treaty. When the agent goes away he says he is going to leave these things to be done by his successor. When Agent Burleigh came he made fine promises of what he would do. I asked for my invoice, but he would not let me have it; and I told him what my grandfather told me. I think the agents are all alike. The agent puts his foot on me as though I were a skunk. And the agents are all getting rich and we are getting poor."

"My friend, what I am telling you is the truth, and what I have seen. What the agents have done in the night, I cannot tell. That is the reason I am telling you this: I want you to report it to my grandfather. I want to go to Washington; and I wish you to do all you can with my grandfather to induce him to let me come there next winter. I want to see my grandfather to ascertain how much money and goods have been sent me, and that I may know how much has been stolen, and who stole it. I would like to have the agents there with my grandfather when I talk to him, that they may hear what I have to say. If there was a Bible there for them to swear upon, they could not swear that they had not stolen the goods."

"My friend, I feel glad to see you; and if I could see my grandfather I should feel better."

"When Burleigh brought the goods the first time he put the goods on the bank of the river; and there was one bale of fine goods with them, and Burleigh said the goods belonged to the Indians; and one of my young men came and told me about the fine bale of goods, and I went and examined it, and it was fine goods, and would have made nice breech-clouts; but we received none of it, and don't know what became of it. This was the second year Burleigh was there. The first year Burleigh was there, Redfield brought and distributed the goods. The first goods Burleigh undertook to bring there was the first fall of his agency, but the goods were sunk. For my part, I don't wish to hide anything. My friend, if you had come to see me, I could have gone into a council-house with you, and could have said what I wanted to say to you without any one being round to fill my ears. My friend, I know what matters you want to inquire about. I think you are the man to try and do some good to my nation, and my heart feels good. I do not speak a lie. They have got my head so turned that I cannot say what I want to say now, and I will stop now and come and talk more this afternoon."

"A steamboat arrived with our goods, and the goods were put out; Burleigh said they were our goods, and they were marked for us; there were five boxes. There were some officers and soldiers there. The boxes remained there on the bank until the next day. At night somebody scratched the marks off and put on other marks. (This statement was witnessed by Medicine Cow and Walking Elk.) They saw it done."

The soldiers told the Indians that the goods belonged to the Indians. At another time Dr. Burleigh had some calico for us, and he said he would take it to his house so that the Indian girls could learn to sew. My daughter went and made one dress, which was given her for making it. Five or six Indian girls went and sewed there and all got dresses. They were two days there. After the young girls sewed two days apiece and got a dress apiece, they never saw anything more of the calico, and never got any more. Another time Dr. Burleigh told us he had some plows for us. After that I saw one of them at Booge's store. We never had any of them. I told Charles Lamont's wife to take good care of that plow; that the whites might come round and, seeing it, take it. That is the way our property goes."

Dr. Burleigh one time came to me and asked me to grant him a favor, and wanted me to agree that he should give a plow away, and I told him to do so; I did not want to disagree with him; and then immediately he came and wanted me to give away another, and I told him to do so; I did not want to disagree with him."

The next day Medicine Cow speaks. It is not an euphonious name, but still it is that of an Indian chief. Medicine Cow spoke as follows:

"I shall speak of Agent Burleigh. At one time Dr. Burleigh told me he was going to put some goods away for the poor: some calico, scarlet cloth, &c. In the fall La Frambois, who has an Indian wife and lives with the Two-Kettle band, came down to get some goods; but the trader had none that he wanted, and La Frambois then said he would go below and get some goods to trade with the Indians; but Dr. Burleigh told him not to go, and that he could have the blankets, calico, scarlet cloth, and all kinds of cloth that had been kept for fall and for the old and the poor. I told him if he paid for them I could say nothing, and he took them and carried them away. The next spring he came back and I asked him for the pay for the goods; there were $1,700 worth; but he said he could not pay for them, as he had paid Dr. Burleigh for them. Then I took the chiefs to Dr. Burleigh and told him to pay us the money he received from La Frambois for our goods; but he said he had got no money. There were plenty of whites and soldiers about at the time."

"I am glad you are here. You know the cause of the murders in Minnesota; if you do not, I do; the agents were the cause. Our agents never give us what our grandfather sends us. I think when the whites make an agreement with each other they do as they agree with each other. If the whites did as they agree with the Indians, there would not be so much difficulty. The agents bring goods, but do not give them to us. When the agent brought us money we asked him to let us see it; but more than half was carried back to the house and we never received it. One time he got and told us that he would keep it until winter, but he never let us have it. The blacksmith won't work for the common Indians, but works for the chiefs and all white men. If the common Indians go to him he will tell them to go away."

"I think all the work Dr. Burleigh has done was done for himself. He purchased lots of cattle and things. When he came there he only had a trunk, but now he is high up—rich. Once in awhile I went and asked Dr. Burleigh about the money, and he saved it for all the Indians, and we did not get it."

"When agent Congor came there he and Dr. Burleigh were together, and we felt bad to see him with the new agent. We went and told Dr. Burleigh that we wanted him to give us the money which he had taken from us; but he would not. I told him if he did not I would tell my grandfather when I went to see him."

"I think a great many of our tribe have frozen to death, and a great many have died of starvation. When I was talking that way to Dr. Burleigh he said he did not care what I said to him; that all up and down the Missouri river all the big men and generals were on his side. The reason I talk this way, the Governor said I must not talk so hard against a young man. The doctor told me I was against him. I answered, 'Yes; you are always against the Indians; you never try to do anything for us.'"

"Another time Dr. Burleigh came and brought us money, and gave us two dollars in paper money and some three and some one dollar, and we don't know what he did with the gold money, but we want to know, and we want to know if that is the way our grandfather does with us. I think if they had asked the young men to learn at school they would have done so; they would willingly attend the school and learn, but they have never had an opportunity. For my part, I think the agents have been an injury to us. When we moved here we had to dig the ground with our fingers. We had done as the whites told us. When Burleigh told us to be soldiers we became soldiers; we burnt the dirt lodges, as he told us; but we were not paid for being soldiers. We tried hard to please the whites. We have often told the same things to the big men before, but it made no difference; but we are glad to see you and hope you will do us some good. One time the doctor (Burleigh) came up and said he had got plenty of goods to keep us all winter; that he had four thousand sacks of flour and plenty of blankets; but we found out that he was not telling the truth; he put it into the store and we had to buy it. One time he told us he was going to keep seven large boxes of goods (one containing traps) for another time, to be distributed to us; but we never received any of these goods, excepting three of our young men got three guns and three suits of clothes as a reward for killing a Santee, and that was all we got. I asked Burleigh to do right; but Burleigh's interpreter would not tell him right. I told him to get another interpreter. Things are no better now. The new agent has come, but he is like a man in the middle of the prairie. Burleigh cleaned the agency of everything, and the new agent has nothing to go on with; no cattle, no wagons, no plows, in fact nothing; everything has melted away like a snow-bank in the summer's sun. I think our grandfather don't know what is done with the money, from what you say to us to-day. I think everything on the agency is gone, and one saw-mill does us no good; there is no one to attend to it. It is the business of the agent to attend to it. It would take a month to start it. We have no lumber. There is no one to attend to our blacksmith shop, nor the carpenter shop; all the tools are gone. Sometimes the blacksmith does some things for the Indians, but works mostly for whites. Since the new agent came there is a good blacksmith. When Burleigh came to the agency there were two mules there, and they are there now; and there were also two horses, but Burleigh went away and swapped them away for two bob-tailed horses, and the Indians have never since seen their horses or the bob-tails."

I will not read further from the speech of Medicine Cow.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I ask the gentleman to read the testimony of Galpin, Frambois, and others, which ought to be there. I do not propose to get up here and defend myself against these Indians.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Indian agent Burleigh referred to is, then, the Delegate from Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's ten minutes have expired.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to say in conclusion I do not propose to take up any testimony in this book from white men. I am letting the Indian make out his own case.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would ask if these parties were under oath.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir; and the gentleman from Dakota was not under oath in his speech to-day. The case was presented before a sub-committee of this House. Whether the Mr. Burleigh here spoken of was the gentleman from Dakota or some other Burleigh, I was not there to know. My sole purpose in occupying the attention of the House at this time was to give these two Indians an opportunity to present their case to Congress.

Now, they complain of these agents. They say their conduct has been the cause of the Indian difficulty, and I fear there is a great deal of truth in the charges and specifications they present. They do not, like the gentleman from Dakota to-day, deal in mere generalities, but they charge a person, by name, with specific offenses, with the taking of their goods, and with the taking of their food and keeping a mess-house and then making the Indians pay for the food that is intended for them. They charge that $1,700 worth of their goods were taken and paid for, and that the agent Burleigh received the money and would not pay it to them. These charges were made by the Indians. I do not make them. I have merely, as I have already stated, desired that these two Indians should have an opportunity to speak to this House and make their charge against whoever it may concern.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CLARKE] will be kind enough to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I will do so.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with regret and astonishment at the charges made by the gentleman from Dakota against the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I supposed that there had been under former administrations some inconsistencies in the conduct of the Indian department, but I believe that the distinguished gentleman at the head of the Department of the Interior, a citizen of the State of Iowa, often honored by the people of that State, in calling to his aid another citizen of Iowa and of my own district to act as Commissioner of Indian Affairs intended to choose an officer who would reform the affairs of that bureau, and I have had faith in the integrity and honor of that gentleman. Therefore I was astounded at the gentleman's charging upon the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs corruption and fraud in the discharge of their several duties, as well as the President of the United States.

Now, sir, I desire that the gentleman shall make these charges specific against these various officers, and if they have been guilty of any act of dereliction in the discharge of their several duties let Congress institute a proper investigation to ascertain where the fault lies in their administration; and I believe I can assure the gentlemen that when the investigation is made these several officers will be able to sustain themselves before Congress so far as the matters alluded to by him are concerned.

I only rose for the purpose of vindicating these gentlemen from the covert attack of the gentleman from Dakota, and to ask him to make his charges specific against these gentlemen, in order that they may know what to defend. But I will say further, that I am informed—whether truthfully or not I cannot say—that the gentleman from Dakota has had personal difficulty with the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs, because his accounts as Indian agent have not been passed upon by that department favorably. I hope this fact has not in any way influenced his action here.

Mr. BURLEIGH. With the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CLARKE,] I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON.] He says he has understood that I have had personal difficulty with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior. I will state that it is not true that I have had any personal difficulty with them in consequence of my accounts not being settled. The charge has been thrown out and heralded all over the country by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I denounce it as a falsehood.

THE REBELLION, ITS CAUSES, ITS CURE.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, all men unite in the opinion that slavery was the prime cause of the rebellion; but that alone, unaided by other great errors that have long had a lodgment in the hearts of the leading men of the South, would not so soon have resulted in a resort to armed force to break up the Government. The Democratic creed of supreme State sovereignty, which comprises all that is claimed in practical nullification and secession, was the great auxiliary that slavery called to its assistance—a sword to strike and a shield to protect—when it resolved to make war upon the Union.

SLAVERY CALLED, THE DEMOCRACY ANSWERED.

When the slaver saw his idol in danger he called for help, and the Democracy of the country, North and South, flew to its relief, and steadily as the needle to the pole so have they stood by it, in evil as well as good report. They gave over to the South their fealty and their votes; they elected none to office except such as were wholly acceptable to the South; they uttered no sentiment, gave no vote, made no resolves that could offend the most delicate sensibilities of the most nervous slaveholder; they were the most submissive, trucking creatures to the South that ever assumed the dignity of a party name. Alas, for the once proud name of Democracy! When it consented to do the bidding of the black man's master it surrendered up its birthright of manhood and became itself a slave.

THE TRUCKLING OF DEMOCRACY.

It broke down the Missouri peace compromise at the bidding of slavery and opened afresh the great wound that threatened the life of the Union in 1819-20. It made war upon freedom, and with fire and sword tried to force slavery into Kansas, and in that guilty struggle it literally murdered its great leader, Douglas, and drove hundreds and thousands of its best and bravest men from its ranks forever. It debauched Buchanan, its favorite President, and made him accept the criminal embraces of the South, filled his Cabinet with a spawn of mercenary tools, whose highest ambition was to serve slavery even at the expense of their country. And when slavery declared war upon the nation, northern Democracy stood at its back, a little out of danger, and gave it aid and comfort.

ALL THIS FOR POWER.

The South was united and voted solid one way. It was a great temptation to aspiring Democrats, who had long been neglected and left out in the cold, to form an alliance with this formidable power, and thus attain to rank and position in the Government. The plan succeeded well for a season. Many a worthless sycophant crawled up from obscurity, without capacity or merit, to place and power, but it was a short-lived glory. The people, the honest people, soon saw through the veil of deception that hid from their view the true condition to which they were thus humiliated, and they left the old Democratic organization, as prudent men shun an infected place, and sought out the Republican party as a wholesome retreat for healthy constitutions, where wise, patriotic, and liberal principles could be propagated free from the taint of slavery.

REPUBLICAN PARTY GROWS.

Recruits from the old party organizations, men of high-souled principles, bearing evidence of a sound morality, with a Christian reverence for the manhood of man, came from the East and the West, from the North and the South, from the Whigs, from the Democrats, from the Abolitionists, and the Know Nothings, and thus an aggregation of great and good men organized a party whose mission was to seize upon our great national edifice, which slavery had been thirty years undermining, and replace its crumbling columns with the solid granite upon foundations deep as truth and strong and solid as right and justice.

IT DID THE WORK.

The South periled all upon the hazard of a single cast of the die; it did more, it drew the Democracy into the toils with it; the twain had one faith, one hope; the war opened; the Republicans accepted the challenge; they called upon the loyal people to rally to the national standard and drive the vandals from the Capitol; the people came; they made war for four long years; they endured hardships, sufferings, privations, and death, but they conquered; slavery shrunk back vanquished, and its craven ally, the northern Democracy, not quite close enough for wounds, crawled back into hiding-places to nurse the wrath its failure engendered in its heart, to come forth on some future occasion when its chances of success may appear more propitious. So much is history.

THEY RALLY AGAIN.

A little repose has given the rebels opportunity to consider their condition and consult what is best for the future. Copperheads, attracted by natural affinities and affections, have joined them in their conclaves, and are aiding them to heal up their wounds, revive their hopes, and prepare the material for another struggle for empire.

THE OLD PLAN ABANDONED.

On the former occasion the South, feeling itself strong enough to accomplish its high designs of breaking down the Government, ventured the undertaking upon their own hook; they knew they had the sympathy of the Democrats, but they had small faith in their pluck to stand up in a square fight against their country; in themselves they had confidence, not only in the will to dare, but the power to do, and they rushed on in their madness to the execution of their crimes.

But now, improving upon what they have learned in the past, they are laying the warp of a second rebellion with more circumspection; not so self-reliant as formerly; they are more wary and cautious, and for that reason, the more dangerous.

THEIR FIRST BLUNDER.

When these rebel spirits found themselves possessed of every element of success; when they had the President (Buchanan) submissive as their own slaves to their will; when his Cabinet were most cordially with them, and possessed of capacities mental and moral that most admirably suited the occasion; when both branches of Congress were ready to back them in any measure that might become necessary to the consummation of the overthrow of the Government; when all the offices were occupied by complying creatures of their will; when the Supreme Court, fresh from its labor of love and of glory, the Dred Scott decision, was ready to take any allowable share in the great crime against liberty, as it had just done against justice and humanity; when the great Democratic party, not yet broken up, though giving palpable signs of disintegration, was waiting to be wooed into complicity with treason, then it was that these madcaps of the South instead of working with the machinery of civil government, and by a combination with the Democracy that stood ready to accept the invitation, then and there was the occasion for the triumph of their plans of overturning the Government, and founding in its stead the cherished confederacy; and the stars and stripes would have soon fallen from the Capitol, and the black flag of slavery taken its place. This was all within the grasp of the conspirators against the nation, but they saw it not, or spurned the aid the Democracy tendered them, choosing to rely upon their own strength and valor to achieve the glory that awaited them in the undoubted success of the enterprise. This was their blunder.

THEY LEARNED A LESSON.

In the misfortunes that followed the rebels in their resort to force to overthrow the Union they have learned a lesson, and though terribly punished for their infamous boldness, they have grown wiser; and as the seed of original sin is still remaining in their hearts, they are resolved to preserve it for a more favorable occasion, when it will be germinated, and a new and perhaps more successful growth of treason may be attempted.

WHAT IS THAT SEED?

It is the claim of supreme State sovereignty; the right to secede; the right to disregard the law of Congress; the right to stay in or go out of the Union at pleasure. These are the heresies that led to the late rebellion, and being still retained by the rebels, are now being carefully stowed away for future use. We were congratulating ourselves and the country that in the overthrow of the rebellion we had cleared the land of the accursed cause thereof, and that henceforth, whatever other troubles might arise to disturb the peace of our people, this one would not be of the number. Vain delusion! The grass is scarcely green upon the graves of our noble martyrs, the brave men who died for the Union, when the apostles of secession are boldly preaching treason in our Capitol, and preparing the disaffected for a second crusade against their country.

REBELLION IS NO CRIME.

They unblushingly affirm, those leaders in treason, that it was no crime to rebel! They believed it was the right of States to secede, and therefore they only followed the fortunes of their States rather than adhere to the nation. No crime! Oh, no; innocent as lambs! Take the following question, put by the committee on reconstruction to the oblivious General Robert E. Lee, who remembered so little of the transactions of the past that on his oath he could not say whether he had taken an oath to support the confederate government or not:

"Question by Senator Howard. Suppose a jury was impeached in your own neighborhood, taken by lot, would it be practicable to convict, for instance, Jefferson Davis for having levied war upon the United States, and thus having committed the crime of treason?"

"General Lee's Answer. I think it very probable that they would not consider he had committed treason."

Very cool, General Lee; very innocent of all crime!

"Question by same. They do not generally suppose that it was treason against the United States, do they?"

Answer. I do not think that they so consider it."

To another question General Lee answers: "I think they (the people) would consider the act of the State (in seceding) legitimate; that they were merely using the reserved rights, which they had a right to do—that was my view; that the act of Virginia, in withdrawing herself from the United States, carried me along as a citizen of Virginia, and that her laws and her acts were binding on me."

That is the doctrine; out of that egg came the rebellion; the rebellion is subdued, but the cause still stands out bold and threatening as ever, and here is General Lee, one of the leaders, and a very guilty leader, too, tells you to your teeth, he has done nothing but his duty to his State—nothing of which he should be ashamed of, much less punished for as a crime!

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS'S TESTIMONY.

Mr. Stephens, the vice president of the confederacy, was also before the committee on reconstruction and testified. He said:

"I believed thoroughly in the reserved sovereignty of the several States of the Union under the compact of Union, or Constitution of 1787. I opposed secession, therefore, as a question of policy, and not one of right, on the part of Georgia." * * * "My convictions on the original abstract question have undergone no change."

That is, being better acquainted with the power and resources of the North, he thought it bad policy to attempt, by force of arms, to break up the Union. But the right to do so he regarded inherent in the States, and is still of that opinion, notwithstanding the failure of the rebellion. His convictions on the abstract right to rebel, whenever a State may choose to do so, "have undergone no change."

So says the Senator-elect from the State of Georgia to the present Congress, and he says this opinion is general with the people of that State; they have barely ceased to be rebels, but hold to the faith of secessionists, which is rebellion in a chrysalis state. A secessionist at heart is a traitor in principle, and give him an opportunity and he will prove himself a rebel in practice.

A TOUCH OF STATE SOVEREIGNTY.

After hearing Mr. Stephens on secession and the right of a State to abandon the Union at pleasure, it will be refreshing to hear him on the right of a State to return to the Union ad libitum:

"I think, as the Congress of the United States did not consent to the withdrawal of the seceding States, it was a continuous right under the Constitution of the United States, to be exercised so soon as the seceding States respectively made known their readiness to resume their former practical relations with the Federal Government, under the Constitution of the United States."

He assumes that as our Government refused them permission to secede—they having the right even without such consent—that therefore they acquired the right to return even against the consent of the Government. This is piling it up rather steep, Mr. Stephens. If your privileges as States were as liberal as you claim, and that those States could go out and return at pleasure—go out to do us mischief and return for the same purpose, it may be—are not the privileges of the General Government equally liberal, and may we not at least have a word with you on your going and returning? If Georgia can leave the Union, may not the Union leave Georgia? And if the Union cannot compel Georgia to stay in, can Georgia compel the Union to admit her volens volens. Surely in a compact rights are mutual among the parties. If one State can leave thirty-four, may not thirty-four leave one? Mr. Stephens's theory works its own destruction. It is not more respectable than Buchanan's, who thought the States had no right to secede, but the Government had no right to prevent them from so doing. This was the last notable oracle of that celebrated "public functionary," and it is a fitting climax to his remarkable career.

MAY WE PRESCRIBE TERMS?

This is scarcely a debatable question. Ever since the surrender in 1865 reconciliation has been progressing by means of terms and conditions proposed by the Government and accepted by the insurgent States. Did not President Johnson exact specific conditions of each of these States? Did he not suspend Governors elected by them from assuming the functions of Governor until laws were enacted and duties performed according to his dictation; and did they not readily comply, thereby recognizing his right to demand the submission and their duty to comply? Has he not suspended sheriffs and judges elected in rebel States until they were purged of their treason by his pardons? Why all this terrible infringement of the rights of those people by the President of the United States, and why are they so submissive and uncomplaining, if they are under no disabilities by reason of their acts of rebellion?

HOW IS IT WITH LOYAL STATES?

Does the President venture so to interpose his authority in Ohio or New York? No, sir; those States have not rebelled against the Government, they have not levied war upon it, they have not induced the slaughter of hundreds of thousands of brave and loyal men in attempts to break up the Government. They have been faithful to their obligations, and have stood up for the maintenance of law and order, and are therefore under no disabilities, threaten no violence, give no occasion for uneasiness on the part of the Government. The guarantees of the Constitution shield them from such unwarrantable interference, because of their continued loyalty to that Constitution and the Government thereof.

THE RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE.

All animate nature has the instinct of self-preservation, a right of universal recognition. Governments are always armed with the same inherent power. Why did the President send armies with the instruments of destruction into the South to spread desolation and death in their march through the southern States? The Constitution gives no such command. Self-preservation was the motive; its rights are paramount to constitutions or laws; the life of the nation was in peril, and the only road of safety was by an appeal to arms, meeting force with force. Shall we be told by these rebels after the conflict has closed that they were innocent and the President guilty? That they had a right to destroy the Government, and that the President was a murderer for resisting them with armed force, whereby blood was shed? Let such as have the patience to listen to such treasonable stuff take a surfeit of it; for myself I want none of it.

SHALL WE HAVE ANOTHER REBELLION?

I hope not, and that we may escape such a calamity it is our duty to do all in our power to guard against it. We know by what means the late rebellion was brought about, and we will be fearfully accountable to the country if we restore the Union without removing, as far as practicable, the causes that led to our disruption. The unbridled license of the vicious must be restrained when the public safety demands it; all laws are restraints upon the natural rights of individuals for public good; whatever the public good shall require the individual members must submit to. Governments are all established and sustained upon this principle; without it there can be no such thing as Government, liberty regulated by law.

WE HAVE TAKEN ONE STEP.

The constitutional amendment abolishing slavery everywhere in the United States was a great step in the direction of future safety. Slavery had done much to precipitate the rebellion. That Samson of terror and of crime is shorn of its locks. To tear from the traitor his cherished idol, slavery, was an invasion of his right of property; but the interest of the many is paramount—the few must submit. Does any one doubt the propriety, or even the justice, of this great measure? Surely none; and yet it cost the South hundreds of millions of dollars. This we did, too, without compensation, which is allowable only in special cases, and in times of great emergency. Slavery made war upon the Government; it failed to accomplish its purpose, and forfeited its existence; its extinction became a public necessity. We have destroyed the full-grown lion in our path, shall the cubs be left to grow up and annoy us? These, too, must be secured; and our work is not done, nor well done, until we have, as far as practicable, provided a defense against all reasonable contingencies of apprehended danger.

BUT IT TAKES TIME.

Nothing is well done that is done in haste. This is a great work; it involves the lives, the quiet, the wealth, and prosperity of many millions of people; not merely those existing in our Government, but the accumulating millions in years to come. We are planting the seed, but the harvest is for our posterity. This is the process of life—we pay to our children the debts we incurred to our parents; we must be patient; this Government of ours is one of gigantic proportions; it cannot be reconstructed in a day. It took the labor and ingenuity of rebels thirty years to bring about the rebellion; and with all this preparation its friends admit now that they commenced at the wrong time and in the wrong way; it may not take as many years to build up what was destroyed, but it must not be unreasonably hurried. He who is impatient at deliberation knows not the importance of the work or cares not for the consequences of a spoiled job.

WHO IS FOR HASTE?

First, the rebels are importunate to get back, and they are very careful to insist upon their rehabilitation under circumstances as nearly like those under which they left as possible. Then the copperheads are pressing for an early restoration of their southern brethren, and they, too, prefer no change in the order of restoration. If they had a right to secede, they insist that right shall still be available to them. If rebelling and waging war on the Union were lawful, as Lee and Stephens and Wise proclaim, then, they say, let us return with that privilege. Stephens says they forfeited no rights by rebelling. He says:

"As the General Government denied the right of secession, I do not think any of the States attempting to exercise it thereby lost any of their rights under the Constitution."

Ah, Mr. Stephens, as you southern gentlemen have claimed the right of secession whenever it may suit you to do so, it is made our greatest duty to put that right, if it exists in any possible form, entirely and forever out of your reach. We should be the laughing-stock of the civilized world if, with these open declarations of rebels, we should invite their return without guarding against a recurrence of the same troubles by the same means. If rebels lost nothing by rebelling, the Union lost many and valuable rights; it lost peace and quiet and money and lives, and cannot forget, it cannot overlook, the high obligation to make sure the guarantees against a repetition of those wrongs; and we cannot consent to hasty and inconsiderate legislation on so vital a matter merely to accommodate impatient rebels, who have not even the grace of penitence to recommend themselves to our favor; nay, demand to be restored at once, and with that demand shake defiance in our very teeth.

A TEST OF LOYALTY.

All admit, even Mr. Stephens admits, that none but loyal men should be admitted to seats in Congress. Hear him:

"I am free to admit that, in my opinion, none should be admitted as a member of either House of Congress who is not really and truly loyal to the Constitution of the United States."

That sounds well, but examine it and you will find it the merest shell, without substance, a deception, a cheat. Loyal to the Constitution? Why Stephens himself claims to be this day a loyal man to the Constitution; yes, he claims that he was loyal even in the very act of rebelling. To do what the Constitution authorizes is to be loyal. Stephens says secession is a constitutional right, therefore it is loyal to secede. Stephens is Senator-elect of Georgia, and expects to claim his seat as such; does he not thereby inform us what constitutes loyalty in his judgment? With a Senate filled with men of such loyalty, how long would the Union stand?

BUT WE HAVE OATHS.

Yes, we have a stringent oath of office for members of Congress, but how long will it remain? Every Democrat in Congress and out of it is for its repeal, and even radical Union men talk gingerly about its modification; others deny its legality, and therefore a nullity, and that if required to take it the veriest traitor could do so and yet escape the pains and penalties of perjury. Rebels all say it is no oath, not being warranted by the Constitution; that is enough for them; besides, they are not very modest in regard to taking or breaking oaths. Put not you trust in rebel oaths; an oath never made an honest man, nor will it bind the conscience of a dishonest one. A member of this House, the reputed leader of the Democracy, said three months ago:

"I am here to-day to say that I would vote now, and it would give me as much pleasure as any vote that I have ever given, to repeal the present test oath."

Another prominent member on the same side of this House devoted an hour to the serious consideration of its immediate repeal, alleging "that its continuance is most unjust and unwise." Indeed, every utterance from that quarter on the subject indicates an ardent desire to dispense with the test oath, which of all things seems to be the most insuperable barrier to the admission of traitors to seats upon this floor.

THE GOVERNMENT THREATENED.

From every quarter where traitors or their sympathizers are found the Government is denounced as a usurpation. Why a usurpation? Because the traitors are not permitted to take charge of the legislation of the nation. If this complaint should assume formidable proportions there is nothing that could be suggested by the brain of wicked and rebellious men more dangerous or destructive, not even outright treason itself. It is claimed by those evil-disposed persons that, inasmuch as eleven States are excluded from a share in legislation in Congress, that therefore the acts of Congress are null and void. Now, those States abandoned the Union in 1861, and their delegations in Congress vacated their seats, and they have remained unoccupied to this hour; and it is gravely assumed that since they left no laws could be constitutionally enacted. If that is so, then we have no Government. It is nonsense to talk of a Government that has no capacity to make or enforce its laws; and yet this is a point now seriously made by our enemies, and they are organizing party foundations upon the impudent and treasonable assumption.

THE OHIO DEMOCRACY.

A few days since, Judge Thurman, as president of the State Democratic convention, in noticing the action of Congress relative to the reconstruction of the rebel States, declared:

"And, in view of these facts, I do not hesitate to say that the doings of the present so-called Congress of the United States are plain usurpations of power."

"To call it a constitutional Congress is a mockery of the Constitution."

Mr. George H. Pendleton, late Democratic candidate for Vice President, on the same occasion said:

"The Union is broken, not by the collision of arms, but by the political action of parties. Its enemies are in high places of power; they sit in the seats of the Capitol; they have their grasp upon its throat; they throttle it to the agonies of dissolution."

Mr. Vallandigham, on the same occasion, said:

"I believe the President will not attempt any violent measures to drive those men from the Capitol, though I think he would be justified in doing so, for they are not a constitutional Congress. They are but usurpers."

Vallandigham has some experience in the matters whereof he speaks, and his opinions are therefore the more noticeable.

WASHINGTON CITY DEMOCRACY.

A paper of this city, of Democratic antecedents, gives its note of warning:

"These men had better beware. They are not a legal Congress, but an unconstitutional body of usurpers. The country feels that the one great error of the President was in his ever recognizing them at all in their self-imposed rump condition. They had no claim for recognition as an official body from any honest man or any other branch of the Government," * * * "A little Cromwellian pluck is just the thing needed now; and there are twenty-two hundred thousand Democrats in the North who would back that kind of pluck with a good deal of relish just now."

REBEL VIEWS ON THE SAME.

"The so-called Senate of the United States, in the absence of the twenty-two legally elected Senators of the southern States refused admittance to their seats by the contumacy of the radical party, is not, therefore, the Senate recognized and demanded by the express terms of the Federal Constitution, and any acts passed by so unconstitutional a body are null and void, and wholly inoperative."

So says the New Orleans Times, the editor late a soldier in the rebel army, and therefore well qualified to judge of the question discussed. Of course his views accord with his long conceived opinions; he fought for them, and he may well be considered sincere in writing for them. He harmonizes remarkably well with his Ohio friend just quoted—not any less so now than when we were in the midst of the conflict in arms; it is the same heaven of treason; it means destruction to the Government, and nothing less will appease their wrath or glut their vengeance.

A Georgia paper says:

"Cold steel has been invoked before by legislative bodies, and the saints are well enough read to remember how Pride's pikemen purged the Parliament House as they would winnow the Capitol."

A SENATOR'S VIEWS.

A Senator from Kentucky a few weeks since declared that the time had come when the Senators from the southern States should be recognized as the legal Senate, and the Democrats should join them, and the President should hold his official communications with them; he was not rebuked by a man of his party, and he may be understood to have uttered the prevailing sentiments, perhaps the deliberate resolves, of his associates in that body.

THE DRIFT OF THESE SENTIMENTS.

They tend to unsettle public confidence, to render the Government odious in the eyes of the rebels, and Democrats especially, that they may be fired up for future action and co-operation in attempts to subvert the Government by fraud or force. They are not satisfied with the results of the rebellion, and they seem resolved upon another effort to reclaim their lost fortunes; and they are beginning in this way to educate their followers up to the spirit of their purpose. Calhoun and his school of nullifiers did the same; they began the drill in 1830; they were fully educated in the school of secession when they struck the blow. Will the people be overcome with a second delusion, involving the life of the nation, before the wounds inflicted by the first are healed? Are the people so fond of war, so weary of peace, that they will lend a willing ear to those master spirits of mischief who seem to have no mission on earth except for crime, no taste but for treason, no enjoyment except in rebellion?

NO LEGAL CONGRESS.

No legal Congress, because the rebel States are not represented—such is the assertion; then no law has been enacted of binding force since 1861. For if their presence in Congress is necessary now to give effect to the laws, it was equally so during every day and hour since the rebellion was commenced. Is all legislation void and of no binding force since 1861?

WHAT OF YOUR BONDS?

The law authorizing loans of money, and the issuing of Government bonds, that now exceed $2,000,000,000, received by your creditors, and those having faith in the honesty and integrity of the people, and scattered all over the civilized world; how stand these great interests, if this Democratic-traitor logic is to be received as the gospel of the new party organization, just elevating its odious features to public view, and sounding the note of revolution in our land?

IT IS RANK REPUDIATION.

It is aiming a deadly blow at the credit of the Government; it is a blast of repudiation, made at a time when the public credit stands most in need of good words; at a time when large sums are pressing new loans upon the market. Who, that has the good of his country at heart, could be engaged in such unworthy work—undermining the nation's good name, when its necessities drive it into the market as a borrower of hundreds of millions of dollars? Will men take loans while the howl of repudiation breaks forth from a whole party that boasts of its twenty-two hundred thousand voters—some of them sounding the scandal from their places in Congress?

PARTY RUN MAD.

A party formed of men of noble and generous natures in all their political conflicts hold the interest of the Government sacred. Parties may flourish or fall, but the nation must not suffer. Not so with this crime-inspiring coalition of rebels and copperheads, that writes treason upon its front, and makes its advent breathing threatenings and vengeance, and lapping out its forked tongue for blood.

THE MOB INVOKED.

Congress, while pursuing the even tenor of its way, and disposing of the nation's business with all the attention, industry, and fidelity possible, and to the entire satisfaction of the people who sent them here, yet this party of violence invokes the mob to drive Congress out of the Capitol by force. This is a short cut to revolution, and its advocates boast of high confidential and official relations with the twenty-two hundred and fifty thousand Democrats of the North. Can it be possible that the Democratic party gives warrant for such proclamations? We are not ready to believe the masses of that party ready to embroil themselves in such a conflict, and bring upon themselves, and perhaps upon their country, unutterable woes. Bad men, adventurers, who have everything to gain and nothing to lose in such commotions, may foment them, but the staid men of the party, however bound in attachment to old political names and associations, will pause and ponder well the issues that such rashness may present before they fall into the toils of treason these guilty leaders are preparing for them.

WHAT HAS CONGRESS DONE THAT OFFENDS?

What is the charge against Congress? Has it not provided all the means proper for carrying on the Government; lessened the taxes, where it was possible; paid the soldier; paid the pensions; fed the starving poor of the South; preserved law and order; administered justice; and given to every branch of the Government all it asked of power or money to carry on the purposes of the Administration? Who complains that Congress withholds its support to any Department, even upon the gentlest hint that anything in its power is needed? And yet Congress is objected to, and must be mobbed, driven out of the Capitol by force, to be called out by unrepented, unpardoned traitors and their confederate Democrats who have assumed the protectorate of the nation.

IT OPPOSES THE PRESIDENT?

Is that a just cause for mobbing Congress? It often happens that differences grow up between the two departments of Government; and have we arrived at that point in moral progress and the science of civil government that when such differences arise they are to be settled by the arbitrament of the mob? If mobbing is the rightful remedy in such cases, who is to decide upon which of the contending departments of the Government the fury of the mob is to be directed? And when the mob shall have demolished the one or the other, as the whim of the instigators may indicate, how is the place to be supplied? If Congress is driven out of the Capitol who are to succeed them? If the President is to be the unfortunate victim of mob violence who is to succeed him? The power that may rightfully depose can rightfully set up authority. The mob, then, becomes the ruling power of the country. This is the logical result of the proposed remedy by mob violence. It must certainly commend itself to all considerate minds as a most sovereign specific for all the ills of government, and is worthy of the source whence it emanates.

DOES IT OPPOSE THE PRESIDENT?

When has Congress interfered with the rights or privileges of the President? We enact laws, and it is our privilege; he vetoes them, which is his privilege; we pass them over his veto if we can, which is our right; and when we cannot, we submit, which is our duty. Who can find any cause of censure in all this? He is busy settling the disorders of the insurgent States. Whether he is using more or less power than the Constitution confers upon him Congress has not offended him by even suggesting the inquiry. If he can restore peace and submission and order and loyalty in those States Congress will not complain. How, then, is Congress regarded as embarrassing the President inasmuch that he is counseled to send a posse of soldiers and disperse Congress for being contumacious? Has the President asked for an appropriation and Congress refused it? Has he asked for power and Congress refused it? Never! Has Congress attempted to interfere with his labors in the rebel States? Not in a single instance. He has been left to the full exercise of his will in this matter, and Congress has made no movement to curb his purposes or question the propriety of his measures.

WHAT CONGRESS HAS DONE.

It has assumed to be the judge of the election and qualification of its own members, and to decide when and upon what terms and guarantees the rebel States shall be restored to their practical relations in the Union. Does any one doubt the right of Congress so to determine? Is it not the bounden duty of Congress to do this? And in so doing, what right, what attribute of power, belonging to the President, is disturbed? Not one! Congress passed the Freedmen's Bureau bill because they deemed it expedient; the President vetoed it for the same reason. Congress performed their duty and were content; the President discharged his, and was likewise content, as we suppose. Is there anything in all this to justify the cry of tyranny against Congress and to invoke the mob? Congress passed the civil rights bill; the President vetoed it; Congress was sufficiently united in the conviction of its propriety, and they passed it over the veto. All this was done in the proper and respectful exercise of unquestioned constitutional right. Can any mortal man discern any wrong in this for which the violence of a mob should be employed to chastise Congress?

BUT THE COMMITTEE OF FIFTEEN!

That is the unpardonable sin. If the constitution of that committee has been the stumbling-block to any, it is because they have not well considered the subject. Both branches of Congress were alike interested in the solution of the difficulties presented, and it was respectful to the two Houses that they proceeded in the matter with a full understanding of each other's views and purposes. They could do this by a joint committee; they could in no other way do it so well or so satisfactorily. It was the pleasure of Congress so to proceed, and that of itself should be an answer to all complainers; it worked no hardship, no oppression; produced no complaint from either branch, and was easily dissolved at any moment when Congress should find it inconvenient or injurious to just and proper legislation.

IT OFFENDED THE PRESIDENT.

If he took offense at the manner in which Congress disposed of its business it was his own misfortune, and not the fault of Congress. It would be a dangerous precedent to set for either department to assume a supervision over the manner of discharging their respective duties. Congress takes its own method in dispatching business; so does the President; each acting in view of their respective convictions of propriety and duty. How can this be the subject-matter of offense? The President may have been desirous for the speedy admission of southern members, and as far as Congress was concerned it had no personal gratification in disobliging the President, but upon honest conviction of duty took the course indicated. Should that offend the President and justify his eleventh-hour admirers in denouncing Congress and threatening it with violence? Reverse the case, and see how ridiculous the pretense of insult to the President becomes. The President knew how anxious Congress was for the success of the civil rights bill, but from a sense of duty he was compelled to disoblige Congress by vetoing it. Now, suppose Congress had lost sight of its good sense and propriety, and had run into a rage, and vituperated bitterly, in and out of Congress, and had threatened him with a mob to expel him from the White House, who would have dared to stand up and justify such folly on the part of Congress? No sensible man on earth. And yet that is the extent of our offending, simply daring to do our duty in a free, independent, and constitutional manner.

BUT WHY SUCH DELAY?

There is no rule that prescribes the speed with which legislation must progress. The experience of the world is, that wise laws are rarely the product of hasty legislation. Ordinary measures may be passed upon with less deliberation, because if found imperfect they may be improved at any time. Not so with this great work of reconstruction; when it is molded into legal form and sent forth as a law it can never be recalled for amendment, as ordinary laws. The interest of eleven States and the destiny of the Union hang upon its provisions. How could haste be recommended under such circumstances? It would have been criminal in Congress to have jeopardized the peace and future prosperity of the nation by precipitate action, whereby blunders may have intervened to annoy our people for a generation to come, without the means of remedy. If the measures proposed shall secure a happy restoration of the Union upon principles of justice and equity, and confer upon the friends of the Union the power and the duty of controlling its destiny, then I am sure no loyal man will murmur at the time bestowed upon the work. That men of treasonable instincts and proclivities will complain is not unexpected, for against the wiles of such evil-disposed creatures, who have already stained our land with blood, we have taken the utmost care to guard our country, and the more they clamor and denounce the measure the more will we be assured it has accomplished the desired object.

NO CONFLICT WITH THE PRESIDENT.

Although it is not required that Congress should defer to the peculiar notions of the President in its legitimate action upon this or any other subject, it is respectful that no unnecessary demonstrations of fretful antagonism should be made. Congress has not lost sight of its dignity in the progress of this business; and the measures adopted do not militate against those employed by the President. The more successful he may have been in preparing the rebel States for a return, the sooner that return will be accomplished. His work is not destroyed or impaired. Peace and order and loyalty must precede restoration. The Army began that work, and the President took up the work where the Army left off, and Congress follows in the wake of the President; all tending in the same direction, having the same object in view—the restoration of the Union.

NO QUARREL WITH THE PRESIDENT.

Congress has no quarrel with the President; it has sought none. Evil-disposed persons, eager for such mischief that they may fatten upon the calamities that would necessarily fall upon the country from such a rupture, are doing what they can to produce that result. They may have had some success in sowing the seed of discord, but relying upon the good sense of the President and Congress, and upon their patriotism, I have faith in the final success of the great measures of restoration and of the ultimate harmony and hearty cooperation of all the departments of the Government in the consummation of this great work. And when the Union shall be restored, under the proposed plan, it will be upon a platform of even-handed justice to all men, so far as Congress has the power to prescribe, leaving to the States the exercise of those reserved rights of sovereignty which the Constitution has wisely secured to them, and which they are so justly zealous to maintain.

WHY SHOULD WE SUNDER?

Now that the rebellion has been subdued, peace restored, and the States about to resume their places once more in the Union, free from all causes tending to future irritation, with a glorious future opening for the encouragement of all who love their country, why should the Union men, who have stood side by side and shoulder to shoulder through all the dreary hours of doubt and conflict and blood, lending their energies of body and mind, and enlisting their hearts and souls in the cause of the Union, now that the glorious consummation is at hand, why should they separate? In God's name, let us yet be brothers; if in the hour of our calamities we were united, let us not degrade the dignity of our manhood or impeach the purity of our patriotism by an unwise separation in the hour of our final triumph.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. Mr. Speaker, I need not assure this House that I approach the investigation of the subject under consideration with hesitation and embarrassment. With hesitation, because of the importance and magnitude of the subject. With embarrassment, because little new can be said on this subject, so often discussed here by abler men. But, Mr. Speaker, in a crisis like the present, when the great and peculiar problem of national reconstruction is set before us, and questions entirely new in human history are presented for solution, it behooves us to address ourselves to the most earnest consideration of this problem and its attendant questions. And, sir, without detaining this House by preliminary remarks, I will approach the subject at once, and ask, where has the war left the States lately in rebellion in their governmental relations? President Johnson, in his proclamations issued with the view of giving provisional governments to these States, says that the rebellion "in its revolutionary progress deprived the people of these States of all civil government." And this doctrine, seven times repeated by him, was the basis, solely, upon which those "provisional governments" were founded.

Senator LANE, of Indiana, says:

"It seems to me that counsel has been darkened on this subject in the statement of the question. A portion of the people and of the Senate believe that these States are yet in the Union; another portion believe that these States are yet out of the Union; and the difficulty of dealing with that question is that both of these contradictory answers are right and both are wrong! Territorially, these States are in the Union; the communities in these rebel States are in the Union; their citizens are citizens of these United States. But the practical question is, whether these people are now, at this time, in such relation to the Government of the United States as to be entitled to participate in the legislation of the Republic. I take the ground that although territorially they are in the Union, although the Government, by the rebellion, has lost no single power that it ever had to enforce the laws, to compel obedience, and to carry on all the machinery of the General Government, these rebel States have voluntarily forfeited and abdicated every right. They are no longer to be recognized as a governing power under the Constitution of the United States."

I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that both these answers are correct, and that this is the precise position they occupy practically. Have they as States any share whatever in the Government of the country? Are they not in fact out of the Union as a governing power or partnership, but in it as a governed community? They are in the Union so far as Territories are in the Union, and no further. From courtesy we may call them States, if we choose, but in their practical relations they are simply Territories, and nothing more. I know, recently, gentlemen have been somewhat averse to proclaim the doctrine thus broadly. But why should they? This is really the condition in which they have been held by every department of the Government.

Congress has assumed that the rebel States had no rights as States in closing their ports to all commerce. Could Congress provide under the Constitution in a tariff bill that the ports of New York shall be opened and the ports of another State closed?

The Supreme Court of the United States has held in the decisions in the prize cases "that all persons residing within the territory occupied by the hostile (rebel) party in this contest are enemies of the United States."

Can public enemies, Mr. Speaker, have a right to control and govern this Union? Away with such nonsense! Nor is this all; the President has also assumed that the rebel States had no rights as States when he appointed provisional governors; ordered conventions; dictated the terms of the constitutions thus to be formed; directed who should vote, and who should be eligible to sit in the convention and hold office; and what oath they should take; and in annulling laws passed by the Legislatures of these States; and in deposing men elected to office. Is it competent for the President of the United States to order New York or any other State to call a convention and change her constitution at his will and in terms prescribed by him? I trust not.

These late rebellious States withdrew from the Union by their own deliberate, voluntary act as governing members, and contemptuously renounced all their privileges in it.

Is the action of States of so little consequence, such child's play, that they can spurn from them those rights and privileges and yet have the same title to them as before? And for this withdrawal and renunciation they had no reason nor provocation, except that being in a minority they could not always rule in the Union as they had done during a greater part of its existence.

Their motto was the demonic one, "Rule or ruin." Thank God, they have not been able to ruin us in war! Shall we now tamely and ignobly permit them to rule and ruin us in peace?

After these acts of secession, or in many cases in anticipation of them, they seized by force or fraud all the United States property they could lay their hands upon—navy-yards, custom-houses, forts, arms, ammunition, arsenals—and traitors in power, Government officials, had violated their oaths and abused the trust reposed in them by a confiding people, by taking especial care that this property should be as large and exposed as possible, and that the North should be deprived as far as might be of the means of defense.

What reward are we bound to render for these acts of shameless treachery and robbery? They fired upon our flag because we would not yield everything to their proud and arrogant demands and commit national suicide. They plotted, nay attempted, to take our capital by force of arms, and to install treason and rebellion supreme in the highest and most sacred places of the nation.

Confident of the success of the schemes which they had been so long concerting, while we had been unsuspecting and resting in fancied security, boasting that their banner would soon wave in triumph over the Capitol here, and wishing to take the fullest advantage of our unprepared condition, they proceeded without delay to open, direct, unprovoked war. Thus proceeding, they of course subjected themselves to the laws of war. This they well knew and understood, and were willing to abide the consequences; consequences which they in their pride believed would be triumph for themselves and defeat and humiliation for us. At least they were ready, yea, anxious, to take the risk. Nor could they plead ignorance of the laws of war. These laws have written themselves in blood upon so many of the pages of history that they are, alas, too well understood by all. The fires of war always burn up parchments and compacts.

"By a state of war that of society is abolished," is the sententious maxim of law. All friendly relations and partnerships cease when men seize each other by the throat in a death struggle. Knowingly and wickedly and voluntarily they committed to the dread arbitrament of war the whole subject of their relations to their before sister States. If conquerors, they would become sovereign and independent; if conquered, they must submit to the common lot of the vanquished—they must become a subject people and their land conquered territory. Against all our remonstrances, our earnest entreaties, our offers of degrading compromises, and even humiliating concessions, they insisted on staking their all and our all upon this horrid game of bloody war, and they have lost, thank Heaven, they have lost!

Now, do they come and say that all this has meant nothing; that all these long years of mustering hosts, of crimson battle-fields, of sufferers' groans, of widows' tears, of orphans' cries, and of prisoners' torments, have meant nothing; and that now we are bound to throw all up, what we have gained by these four years of bloody war, and play the game over again in the arena of these Halls, and let them return to the Union with plenary powers and without conditions-precedent? Play the game over again! Merciful God!

Yes, that is the meaning; that is what is really contained in every appeal for the indulgent treatment of the erring but chivalrous South; that is the dream of southern ambition. But should we fail to secure what we have won at such terrible cost, we will be false to ourselves, false to humanity, and recreant to the great sacrifices we have made, and will deserve the maledictions of mankind and the vengeance of Heaven.

Why should we not insist on conditions before these States are restored to fellowship and power again? Will any one say that the South has waged this war with such peculiar honor and humanity that the usual laws of war ought not to apply in their case? To what facts will he appeal in vindication and confirmation of this plea? Will he point to the surprises by which the war was sprung upon us, or turn to the persecutions of the loyalists of the South by threats, by confiscation, by exile, by imprisonment, and by hanging? Will he recall our attention to the schemes for desolating the North by pestilence and conflagration and insurrection.

Will he ask us to remember the plot for the murder of the President-elect on his first approach to the scene of his labors, and to his assassination when his labors were nearing the goal of accomplishment? Will he urge upon us the recollection of the refusal of quarter upon the battle-field, and the cold-blooded, heartless massacre of the unresisting? Or will he invoke us to look at the prison pens in which so many thousands of patriot soldiers were shut up like sheep for the slaughter, for cold and heat and hunger and storms and disease, and for the tyranny of brutal keepers to work their will upon until death should come, or such exhaustion that they might be exchanged, as those from whom nothing could be feared in the future?

Let us attempt the folly to proceed to a restoration of the Union without guarantees, and the expectations of permanent harmony between the two great sections of our country will prove an idle dream. It will be the vain cry of "Peace, peace," and there will be, permanently, no "peace" for us.

That profound thinker and practical statesman, Robert Dale Owen, in discussing this subject, says:

"We can never, indeed, forget—God forbid that we should—the terrible consequences of treason; the hardships, the sufferings, the lost lives, the parents and widows bereaved, the countless thousands of homes made desolate among us. But to avert evils in the future better befits a Christian people than to avenge injuries of the past. Let us learn of the despised and the lowly. Is it we only who have injuries to requite? What were our sufferings during the war compared to the thousand wrongs perpetrated throughout generations against the millions of southern slaves? But though the iron entered into their souls, did they return evil for evil? Did they forget when the day of liberation dawned the words of the text, 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord'?

If there be among our people a revengeful element let us not pander to it. If we impose conditions before we restore political rights to those who, defying law and Constitution by force of arms, became public enemies, it ought to be in defense, not in requital.

"If we impose conditions." To a dispassionate looker-on it must seem strange that, here in the North, that should be a question at all. At the close of a four years' embittered war—producing a radical change in the legal and social condition of four million people, creating two vast antagonistic public debts, and entailing a thousand diversities of interest between millions on one side and millions on the other—it would be a thing incredible that government could be properly or safely resumed, without stipulation or precaution, as if nothing had happened. At such a juncture in our national affairs wise precautionary measures are as strictly a dictate of duty as they are clearly a matter of right.

"As to the right in this case, the space I prescribe to myself forbids more than a few words, even if I deemed it more necessary than I do formally to argue a question so plain.

"I shall not, therefore, here broach the speculative inquiry, what is the precise legal status of the late insurgent States? A mere technical view of a great subject is always a contracted one. Questions involving the life or death of nations are not decided by fine-drawn theories. Good Abraham Lincoln, with that sagacious common sense which marked the man, when alluding, in the last speech he ever made, to the disputed point whether the seceded States 'are in the Union or out of it,' said 'That question has not been nor yet is a practically material one; and any discussion of it while it thus remains practically immaterial can have no other effect than the mischievous one of dividing our friends.'

"Neither shall I institute any inquiry as to our power at this time to impose conditions-precedent to restoration. If, by the sacrifice of three hundred thousand lives and three thousand millions of treasure, the North has not won the right to decide what guarantees are needed to avert in the future the perils and the sufferings of the past, then the chapters on war and peace in the code of international law are so much waste paper; then no rights can be obtained by conquest; then the sword is a worthless weapon, fitted only to destroy, impotent to save.

"Ere we deny such a right we must blot from the books some of the best known and most universally recognized principles of public law. We must reject the accepted doctrine that civil war is subject to the same general rules as foreign war; or else we must refuse assent to what every publicist of repute has set forth (and what common sense suggests) as among the most important of national rights and duties; the rule, namely, that a nation, especially a victor nation, ought to protect itself not only against immediate but against prospective dangers. Deriving all rights attendant on conquest from 'justifiable self-defense,' Vattel says:

"When the conqueror has subdued a hostile nation he may, if prudence so require, render her incapable of doing mischief with the same ease in future." * * * "If the safety of the State lies at stake, our precaution and foresight cannot be extended too far. Must we delay to avert our ruin until it has become inevitable?" * * * "An injury gives a right to provide for our future safety by depriving the unjust aggressor of the means of injuring us."—Vattel, book 3, sections 201, 44, 45.

"To us, and not to the 'unjust aggressor,' who appealed to the wager of battle and lost, belongs at this time the right to decide what guarantees are needed for the public safety, and how that 'unjust aggressor' shall be rendered 'incapable of doing mischief with the same ease in future.' Dearly we paid for that right! We shall commit a folly unparalleled in the annals of nations if we neglect to use it.

"But if all things are lawful for us, all things are not expedient. Thus, though due time must be taken for the maturing and consummation of precautionary measures, yet, on the other hand, one section of a Republic containing a fourth of its inhabitants cannot, except for a season, safely be shut out from Federal representation. Therefore the political rights of the States lately in insurrection should be restored to them at the earliest day consistently with the peace and safety of the country."

So by their own acts, by the laws of war, by the great axioms of the universal law of right, the rebellious States have forfeited, abdicated, and lost their position, and all the rights and privileges which they held as governing members in the Union, while by their failure in war they are still retained, and most justly so, under the authority of the General Government. The rebel General Thompson, in his farewell address to his troops, very pitifully expressed a clear comprehension of the real state of the case, and of their position:

"You must remember now that you have no rights, and can only claim such as may be given you by the conquerors, and the less you say about politics until you have become naturalized the better for you."

This is the common-sense, practical view of the case by one who had fought bravely to establish the "confederacy" when the humiliation of defeat was upon him, and before the alluring promises of "My Policy" had given the hope of returning power to the leaders of the rebellion. The eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] says:

"Eleven of the columnar supports of our political edifice are now lying around us, like the giant columns of Tadmor and Palmyra, with shaft and capitol and architrave alike shattered by the mighty convulsion that has laid them all in ruins. Where is the hand that is to lift these columns to their place?"

Where, indeed, is the power that shall reunite these dissevered fragments? One, as by authority, says:

JULY 24, 1865.

The government of the State will be provisional only until the civil authorities shall be restored, with the approval of Congress. Meanwhile military authority cannot be withdrawn.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

To W. L. SHARKEY.

And again:

OCTOBER, 1865.

It must, however, be distinctly understood that the restoration to which your proclamation refers will be subject to the decision of Congress.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Secretary Seward in these official dispatches answers the query by informing Governors Sharkey and Marvin that the power and the right to restore are with Congress. This is a logical and just answer; for in our Government sovereignty is in the people alone. Its exercise is entrusted to agents. If the functions of these rebel States were "suspended" the sovereign power alone can grant relief. But to which of the agents must they apply? Certainly not to the judicial, for that only interprets; nor to the Executive, for he only executes the law; but to Congress, which has full power to extend the necessary relief. The Supreme Court has settled this point clearly:

"For, as the United States guarantees to each a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a State before it can determine whether it is republican or not."—7 Howard, 42.

Having, as I trust, Mr. Speaker, clearly, fully, and comprehensively demonstrated that Congress not only has the right, but that it is its bounden duty, to legislate upon and determine this question, I will proceed briefly to analyze its action.

The joint committee of the two Houses of Congress in the legitimate exercise of their powers, after patient investigation and deliberation, have presented a series of measures, in the form of a constitutional amendment, which I earnestly commend to the acceptance of this House. These measures are the result of the deliberations of the soldiers and statesmen who saved the Republic from the rebellion. They secure the rights of the rescued freedmen and prepare a sure way for their ultimate equality before the law. They annihilate forever the distinctions erected by a corrupt aristocracy; they sanctify the public obligations and repudiate all claims in the name of the rebellion. Divine-like, they hold out to the most offending the prospect of final forgiveness, in return for future fidelity and loyalty. What hero who fought for his country, or what citizen who honors such a hero, or what philanthropist will refuse to take his stand under the flag which floats over a platform so broad, so catholic, and so comprehensive?

Mr. Speaker, shall I point you to a statement of these propositions?

1. Giving constitutional sanction and protection to the substantial guarantees of the civil rights bill, which passed both branches of Congress over the President's veto, and has been assailed because it was supposed to be infringing the provisions of that instrument as it stands.

2. Confining the basis of representation among the several States to the whole number of persons in each State that enjoy the elective franchise, thus cutting up by the roots and forever destroying a system under which the southern aristocracy has represented other human beings, their equals before God and man, who were deprived of civil and political rights.

3. That all classes who have previously, as members of Congress, and other officers of the United States, or members of any State Legislature, or executive or judicial officers of any State, sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, shall hereafter be deprived of all right to hold the position of Senator or Representative in Congress, elector of President or Vice President, or any office, civil or military, under the Government of the United States, or any of the States. This will reach all the chiefs of the rebellion, civil and military, extending to the officers of the rebel army and navy, members of Congress and State Legislatures, and the State and local judiciary; and is the substitute for the third section opposed by the radicals because it did not go far enough on the one hand, and by the conservatives because it went too far on the other. This provision is to stand until two thirds of the Congress of the United States shall consent to its abrogation.

4. The recognition of the war debt for the suppression of the insurrection and for the payment of bounties or pensions to our soldiers as an inviolate and inviolable obligation upon ourselves and posterity.

5. (which is the original fourth section.) The solemn declaration that neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation in aid of insurrection or rebellion, or any claim for compensation or emancipation of slaves.

6. That Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

Personally, my preference would have been that this Congress had gone a step further and declared for equality of suffrage. I believe if the battle had been fought bravely on that issue it would have won; and once won, all agitation on the subject of races would have ceased forever. Men speedily and always acquiesce in the inevitable. We must come to that in the end, and soon. A nation must act on its declared principles. That all men are created "equal" in rights is no glittering generality. It is God's truth!

A majority of my colleagues think differently on this subject, and I yield my personal preferences. And I deem it no treason to principle to advance toward a great truth and a great reform one step at a time. Time alone effaces deep prejudices, and nature effects all things gradually. I am content, then, under the circumstances, to see "civil rights" asserted here, with the other beneficent measures proposed, and await patiently the action of time and the "sober second thought" of the people on the question of suffrage.

But, sir, let us examine this subject still further and see what light experience and experiment have thrown upon it. As the principles of our Government require that the people at large should be the depositaries of civil power, it is essential, therefore, that the whole people be trained as rapidly as possible to the exercise of this power.

It is hence desirable that the elective franchise should be made as broad as will consist with safety and order. The principle is plain enough; respecting its application there is a great variety of opinion. Some contend that in the reconstruction of these States the ballot and the right of holding office should be confined to whites who have always been loyal. Adopt this rule and how many voters and officeholders could be found in South Carolina? Could a score? Could many more be found in any one of the cotton States? Some would add to these the amnestied rebels. Experience, that teaches the dearest of all schools, has shown us that this places the civil power and governmental machinery in the hands of those "Who, having sworn against their will,

Are of the same opinion still."

And not only of the same opinion, but of the same traitorous purpose, to be put in execution as fast as prudence and a wise caution will allow. The oaths are taken, to a wide extent, with a mental reservation amounting to perjury. This perjury is even justified and recommended by many influential papers at the South. "We have a right," say they, "to vote and hold our property. Any obstacle, therefore, thrown in the way by an oppressive Government at Washington, whose rightful authority we do not recognize, is in its own nature null and void."

The determination of the intelligent, influential classes at the South is manifestly to keep just as much as possible of slavery, aristocracy, State sovereignty, and disloyalty; to make our victory as barren of results as they can; and, defeated by arms, still to conquer by political action and party intrigue. Will we allow this wicked triumph by yielding to the clamor against color? "By their fruits shall ye know them," is the teaching of eternal truth. In the light of this divine enunciation, how much longer shall we follow that false philosophy, which leads only to bewilder? What political fruits have we reaped from these southern fields by giving the ballot exclusively to the pardoned and amnestied whites and denying it to the loyal blacks? Let the results of their elections answer.

Beginning with North Carolina, the first State reorganized under the proclamation of the President, and then taking the other States in the order of their reconstruction, we find that she vindicates the sincerity of her loyal professions by electing Jonathan Worth, a rebel, Governor, over Holden, professedly loyal. William A. Graham and John Pool, Senators, neither of whom can take the required oath, and Messrs. Stubbs, Clark, Fuller, Turner, Brown, Walkup, and Jones, an unbroken delegation of disloyal men, to the House of Representatives. (Election held first Thursday in November, 1865; provisional governor appointed May 29, 1865.)

Reorganized Mississippi elects Benjamin G. Humphreys, a general in the rebel army, Governor, and J. L. Alcorn and W. L. Sharkey Senators. Alcorn was also a general in the rebel service, and cannot take the necessary oath. Sharkey might perhaps do so. Electing also Messrs. Reynolds, Pierson, Harrison, West, and Peyton to Congress. Reynolds was a colonel and served faithfully in the field during the war, and Pierson, Harrison, and West are so compromised by the rebellion that they cannot take the oath of office. Mr. Peyton, I understand, has been a consistent Union man throughout. (Provisional governor appointed June 13, 1865; election held second Monday in October, 1865.)

Georgia, reconstructed, but not clothed in her right mind, elects Charles J. Jenkins Governor, and sends the rebel vice president, Alexander H. Stephens, and that unrepentant rebel, Herschel V. Johnson, to the Senate, and Cohen, Cook, Buchanan, Cabaniss, Matthews, Christy, and Wofford, an entire delegation of traitors, to represent the State and its people in the Congress of the United States. (Provisional governor appointed June 17, 1865; election held October 4, 1865.)

Reconstructed Alabama, but unrepentant, elected Robert M. Patton, an active and bitter secessionist, Governor, and made Lewis E. Parsons and George S. Houston Senators, and Langdon, Freeman, Battle, Taylor, Pope, and Foster Representatives in Congress. Not one of these can take the prescribed oath of office. Langdon is a most bitter rebel; Freeman a colonel, and served through the war; Battle was a brigadier general in the rebel army; and Foster was a member of the rebel congress. (Provisional governor appointed June 21, 1865; election held first Monday in November, 1865.)

Rebels unrepentant and unrepenting reorganized Florida by electing a disloyal man for Governor, for one Senator, and for Representative in Congress. And as a matter of prudent policy Governor Marvin, a truly loyal man, was sent to the Senate to fill the term which expires March next. Judge Marvin, I apprehend, does not stand the ghost of a chance for reelection, unless in the mean time the leopard should change his spots, and the Ethiopian his skin. (Provisional governor appointed July 13, 1865; election held October 10, 1865.)

South Carolina, reconstructed and reorganized, washes her political garments from the stain and blood of treason by the election of Mr. Orr, a prominently disloyal civilian, over Wade Hampton, a raiding rebel general, as Governor, and by the election of Perry and Manning as Senators, both of whom are thoroughly identified with the rebellion, and by the election of a delegation, namely, Kennedy, Aiken, McGowan, and Farrow—Kennedy was a general in the rebel army—to the House of Representatives, neither of whom, with the exception, perhaps, of Mr. Aiken, can take the necessary oath. (Provisional governor appointed June 30, 1865; election held October 18, 1865.)

Louisiana responds to the inquiry by electing J. Madison Wells Governor, and by choosing Randall Hunt and Henry Bozer Senators; all active rebels during the war, and unrepentant since; and sends her entire delegation of Representatives in the national Legislature—St. Martin, Barker, Wyckliffe, King, and Ray—not one of whom can take the prescribed oath. St. Martin was a register of voters under the rebel government; Barker editor of the Advocate, twice suppressed for disloyalty; Wyckliffe of the rebel army, and captured at Port Hudson; King and Ray both active, energetic, and influential secessionists. I will not pursue this sickening investigation, but will confine myself to the seven States which have been warmed into life, and reorganized and reconstructed under the especial direction and fostering of the Executive of this nation. And what is the grand result? All the State officers elected because of their participation in the rebellion; and of the fourteen Senators chosen from the reconstructed States, two only, Governor Marvin and Judge Sharkey, can take the oath of office. Of the Representatives elected from these seven States but two can take the oath prescribed by the laws of the country.

Mr. Speaker, "we cannot gather figs from thorns, nor grapes from thistles;" and the sooner we abandon a policy that has nearly crushed out the loyal men of the rebel States, and clothed the rebels with power, the better for us and for the nation. "By their fruits shall ye know them." And there they are; the jewels of the "Confederacy," and the advocates of the principles of the "Corner-Stone," presented as a nucleus for the elements of a new and a nobler national life—a life devoted to Freedom, to Justice, to Truth, to Equality, and Humanity, to crystallize upon. In all soberness could we justly anticipate any other result from the "Policy" adopted? If this is but the earnest, the first fruits of the folly of enfranchising only the foes of the Government, what shall we expect from the full harvest? From the utter failure of this effort to build up loyal governments in the rebel States from the disloyal elements, I apprehend we shall ere long accept the true principles of a democratic system of government, and for the purpose of securing a reorganization more favorable to freedom and justice, add to the loyal and amnestied whites the freedmen and free men of color. There are strong reasons in favor of this policy. They are men! And we have made them citizens! The citizen's suffrage is not a privilege or a prerogative, but a right! Every man has a right to have a voice in making the laws by which he is governed and protected! That is an inherent right, not a privilege conferred. It is a part of liberty itself. Every man is entitled to this except he forfeit it by crime or rebellion. On no ground except that of crime can the elective franchise be denied to any class, without admitting the monarchical doctrine that civil rights and authority descend from the rulers, and that they have a right to confer as a privilege that which the principles of our Government teach belongs to the "people"—to all men in common.

Our doctrine is that all rights and all privileges and all prerogatives belong to the whole people, and that through our elective representative system these rights and powers are delegated successively to men holding official positions for specific, fixed periods of time, and return regularly to the people again. Our doctrine is that all civil and political rights inhere in the people, and when they rise to the hands of those in official authority they are powers delegated to them, and they evermore come back to the people.

"As the clouds draw their rain from the ocean, and, pouring it down upon the ground, return it to the ocean again, so authority goes from the common people to their rulers, and returns to the common people again."

"In this country a poor man without a vote is like a vagabond king hiding for his life; but a poor man with a vote is honored and courted by all. A hundred voteless black men will be consigned to contempt and outrage and injustice; but a hundred black men with votes will be a school, and every candidate play schoolmaster to them, and expound and argue the annual questions of policy. Comprehensively viewed, voting carries with it political education."

Nothing so much prepares men for intelligent suffrage as the exercise of the right of suffrage. Man cannot be educated to a proper use of liberty in any way so well as by making him use it. In our hour of peril we appealed to these men to assist us by their arms; ought they now in our hour of safety be spurned back to serfdom? Are national gratitude and national honor mere words with us? Is there no gulf of meanness into whose slimy and fetid waters we are not ready to plunge? Shall we sacrifice our friends to our enemies?

In our obsequiousness to rebels shall we bind our allies hand and foot and give them over to infuriate men who would delight in wreaking vengeance on them for our success and for that aid of theirs which secured, or at least hastened, this success? I will not say that we should not have conquered without the friendship of the colored people of the South, but it must have been done at much greater cost of time and treasure and blood and suffering. They were our guides, our spies, our concealers, and our nurses. The fugitive from Libby or Florence or Andersonville found food and shelter in their cabins, and the darling of many a mother, the pride and hope of many a northern home, was affectionately tended by a second mother, who studied every want, tried to soothe every pain, and, when naught availed, wiped off the clammy death-sweat, and closed the glassy eye. As soon as we would permit them to do so, they became our comrades on the battle-field, and with unblenching valor led the forlorn hope.

A popular fallacy was that the negro could not be a true man because he would not fight, a fallacy strange enough in the mouths of those who were so often prating about the dangers of a negro insurrection and the horrors of St. Domingo.

The black man in this war has shown that he has an intelligence not to be deceived, a virtue not to be seduced, and a valor not to be daunted. In what quality of manliness does the negro race fall below the degraded whites of the South? Yet these men are and have been voters always. Is there no danger in intrusting the ballot to so many ignorant blacks? I answer frankly, there is. But the danger is far greater of intrusting it to the ignorant and disloyal whites alone. Loyal ignorance, whether white or black, is beyond comparison less dangerous than disloyal ignorance. I cannot see how the ballot is affected by the complexion of the hand that throws it; but I do see how it is essentially affected by the disposition that moves the hand. There is an instinct in virtue which keeps its possessor from going very far astray. But the instincts of vice are all for wandering.

Worst and most perilous of all is disloyal intelligence. This, in the persons of such men as Calhoun, and Rhet, and Wise, and Yancey, and Breckinridge, and Jeff. Davis, has brought upon us the awful perils through which we have just passed and are now passing.

If the negro is below the whites of the South in mental strength and culture, is he not infinitely above a large majority of them in all the instincts of loyalty and devotion to liberty? He at least has always been true and faithful to his country, which has repaid him with injustice, oppression, and stripes. He has always obeyed the laws of the land, paid taxes without a murmur, and yielded his body a willing sacrifice whenever perils dawned upon the nation; and by his singularly good conduct in the trying situation of the last five years he has earned this boon of suffrage, if it were not his by right, and has given ample evidence that he will make a proper use of it.

To preserve peace in the States and harmony in our Federal system, I am fully persuaded, Mr. Speaker, that every man should be made equal before the law, as he is equal before the promises of the Gospel. And speaking here to-day between the Old and the New, I should be unfaithful to my own convictions if I refrained from uttering these words before you. Look which way we will, we have no sign in heaven or on earth to guide us except the sign of Liberty and Equality before the law as proclaimed at our national birth in the great Declaration:

"God has devolved on us the experiment of self-government. We are not suffered to make it with the highest types of human form and intellect alone. It is His decree, from which there is no escape, that we shall make it with all the races of the earth commingled and combined. They are here, planted, scattered, rooted among us. To separate them is impossible. To subjugate the inferior to the superior race itself defeats the experiment, and will lead again, as it has already led, to cruel war. In this crisis let us fulfill with fidelity and honor the responsibilities which are devolved upon us."—General Martindale, February 22, 1865.

Mr. ECKLEY asked and obtained leave to have a speech printed as part of the debates.

[The speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. JULIAN obtained the floor; but yielded to Mr. GRINNELL, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. CULLOM: A petition of a large number of citizens of De Witt county, Illinois, asking Congress to enact such laws regulating inter-State insurance of all kinds as will establish the greatest security to the interests of the insured.

By Mr. TAYLOR: The petition of Brevet Brigadier General Ward B. Burnett, asking for an adjustment of his pension.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 11, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of Friday last; but before concluding it—

Mr. CONNESS. I move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal, that we may proceed in the morning hour with some business of consequence.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRIS. I present the petition of a large number of persons, residents of the county of Chenango, State of New York, stating that a very large portion of the entire bank-note currency in circulation used by them in their business consists of the State bank notes of the State of New York. They state that there were on the 28th of May over $19,000,000 of circulation of the New York State banks, and they ask that provision may be made to extend the time within which the tax provided for upon circulation of that character shall be imposed. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Henry Tuthill, of Schuylers county, New York, praying for compensation for carrying the United States mail; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in favor of the passage of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of Mrs. Drusey A. Layman, widow of the late Eugenius E. Layman, who was a private in company C, seventeenth regiment West Virginia volunteers, praying to be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a petition of trustees of the Presbyterian church at Lewinsville, Virginia, praying to be reimbursed for damages to their church during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of manufacturers of India-rubber springs used on railroad cars, praying that the internal revenue tax of six per cent. upon the manufacture of those articles may be removed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON presented three memorials of citizens of the town and county of Alexandria, Virginia, remonstrating against the repeal of the acts of Congress under which the town and county of Alexandria were by the Government of the United States "ceded and forever relinquished to the State of Virginia, in full and absolute right and jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon;" which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 613) to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 149) declaratory of the law of bounty, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 86) to provide for the publication of the official history of the rebellion, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a memorial of the Legislature of Massachusetts, praying to be reimbursed for moneys expended for the common defense, submitted a report, accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. No. 106) to reimburse the State of Massachusetts for money expended in the purchase of guns and ammunition, for procuring plans for coast defense and harbor obstruction, and for the erection of works of coast defense. The joint resolution was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 317) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, approved July 1, 1862,' approved July 2, 1864," reported it with amendments.

SAFE-KEEPING OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 621) to regulate and secure the safe-keeping of public money intrusted to disbursing officers of the United States, to report it back and recommend its passage. The bill is very short and plain; the committee have proposed no amendment to it, and I should like to have it taken up and disposed of at once by the consent of the Senate.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to make it the duty of every disbursing officer of the United States having any public money intrusted to him for disbursement to deposit the same with the Treasurer or some one of the Assistant Treasurers of the United States, and to draw for the same only as it may be required for payments to be made by him in pursuance of law; and to provide that all transfers from the Treasury of the United States to a disbursing officer shall be by draft or warrant on the Treasury or an Assistant Treasurer of the United States; but in places where there is no Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer of the United States the Secretary of the Treasury may, when he deems it essential to the public interest, specially authorize in writing the deposit of such public money in any other public depository, or, in writing, authorize the same to be kept in any other manner, and under such rules and regulations as he may deem most safe and effectual to facilitate the payments to public creditors.

If any disbursing officer of the United States shall deposit any public money intrusted to him in any place or in any manner, except as authorized by law, or shall convert to his own use in any way whatever, or shall loan, with or without interest, or shall for any purpose not prescribed by law withdraw from the Treasurer or any Assistant Treasurer, or any authorized depository, or shall for any purpose not prescribed by law transfer or apply any portion of the public money intrusted to him, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged an embezzlement of the money so deposited, converted, used, loaned, withdrawn, transferred, or applied, and every such act is declared to be a felony, and upon conviction is to be punished by imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than ten years, or by fine not more than the amount embezzled nor less than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

If any banker, broker, or any person not an authorized depository of public money, shall knowingly receive from any disbursing officer, or collector of internal revenue, or other agent of the United States, any public money on deposit or by way of loan or accommodation, with or without interest, or otherwise than in payment of a debt against the United States; or shall use, transfer, convert, appropriate, or apply any portion of the public money for any purpose not prescribed by law; or shall counsel, aid, or abet any disbursing officer or collector of internal revenue or other agent of the United States in so doing, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged an embezzlement of the money so deposited, loaned, transferred, used, converted, appropriated, or applied; and any president, cashier, teller, director, or other officer of any bank or banking association who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of embezzlement of public money, and punished as before provided.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to call the attention of the Senator who reported the bill to what seems to me to be a very unusual species of crime provided for in it, that is, that if any person counsels, aids, or abets an officer illegally to deposit public money in an unauthorized depository—that is the purport of it—he shall be guilty of an offense. According to my recollection, it is a new thing to provide for an accessory to an offense of this kind. Take the crime of larceny, for instance. Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking, and carrying away of the goods of another; but we have no such thing as advising or counseling a person to feloniously steal, take, and carry away the goods of another. I do not know that any man can be guilty in such a way. If he has anything to do with the crime he is guilty of theft; but here there seems to be a provision for a sort of accessory to a crime, which is a minor offense. It is a very singular provision.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It might be difficult to convict, practically. That is the only trouble. If a person knows that a public officer is about to misappropriate public money, or embezzle it, and counsels and aids him in doing so, the bill makes it an offense. The difficulty will be, perhaps, to convict him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It strikes me as rather a novel offense.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The bill is drawn on the state of facts developed in the last striking case here. There were half a dozen concerned in it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There may be accessories in treason and murder. A person aiding and abetting the enemy is guilty of treason; but we do not speak of persons aiding and abetting other offenses. In robbery all are principals.

Mr. WADE. Charge them as principals.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is what I think ought to be done. I am not going to object to the bill, but I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to this provision as a singular one.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I saw and the committee saw that it was very stringent, but we came to the conclusion that we could not make it too much so. We did not submit any amendment to the bill; and if Senators wish to look at it further I shall not detain the Senate now with it, but will consent to let it go by for the moment, and I shall call it up again when they have looked further into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the bill be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, that course will be pursued.

Mr. FESSENDEN subsequently asked that the consideration of the bill be resumed; and it was again taken up.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall be obliged to the Senator from Maine if he will just state what the bill amounts to; I have not heard it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a bill which came from the other House, directing public officers to deposit the public money which comes into their possession either in the Treasury or the sub-Treasury, at the place where they may be, and nowhere else, unless in places specially assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury, where there is no Treasury or sub-Treasury, and making it a penal offense to deposit it in other institutions, and also punishing all aiding and abetting in the offense.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Where there are no officers of the Treasury, may the national banks be used?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Secretary of the Treasury is to have power in such cases to direct where the public money shall be deposited.

The bill was passed.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I have a telegraphic dispatch from Senator LANE of Kansas, which shows that it is absolutely necessary for him to leave for Kansas immediately on important, urgent business. I am therefore requested to ask for him leave of absence for ten days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senator from Kansas have leave of absence from the Senate for ten days.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. My colleague [Mr. SUMNER] has been called home by a dispatch on account of the dangerous sickness of his mother. He wishes to obtain leave of absence for two weeks from to-day, and I make the motion that that leave be granted.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to give notice to the Senate that to-morrow at one o'clock I shall ask them to proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

REPORT OF RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that five thousand additional copies of the report of the committee on reconstruction be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will go to the Committee on Printing under the rules.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 107) in relation to the purchase of certain lands at Point Lookout, Maryland, for a military and naval hospital; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented documents in support of the joint resolution; which were referred to the same committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 362) to change the times for holding the courts of the United States for the eastern district of Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRESWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 363) declaratory of the act approved March 3, 1863, being an act to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States, approved February 24, 1865; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 364) to authorize the establishment of a repertory in Germany, to illustrate the physical, political, and social condition, the natural products, and the resources of the several States of the Union; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 365) amendatory of the act of July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims," &c.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As this subject has been before the Committee on the Judiciary, I move the reference of this bill to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, in relation to the expediency of purchasing from the owners thereof the equestrian portrait of the late Lieutenant General Winfield Scott, which now adorns the walls of the Capitol, was referred to the Joint Committee on the Library.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION LAW.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 477) reported from the Committee on Commerce, further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest that the Clerk may omit reading until the beginning of the tenth section, as a bill has already passed on this subject, and undoubtedly there will be no objection to the sections he is now reading. I ask that, by unanimous consent, the reading of that part of the bill be dispensed with, and thus save some little time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of those sections will be dispensed with unless some Senator desires that all the bill be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill from the tenth section. The tenth section provides that barges carrying passengers while in tow of a steamer shall be subject to the provisions of the acts for the preservation of the lives of passengers, so far as relates to fire-buckets, axes, and life-preservers. For a violation of this section the penalty is to be $100.

By the eleventh section steamers used as freight boats are to be subject to the same inspection and requirements as provided for ferry, tug, and canal-boats, by an act relating to steamboats, approved the 8th day of June, 1864, and to the provisions of this act.

The twelfth section provides that if any person connected, as a member or otherwise, with any association of steamboat pilots, engineers, masters, or owners, shall accept or attempt to exercise the functions of the office of steamboat inspector, it shall be a misdemeanor, for which he shall forfeit his office, and shall be further subject to a penalty of $500.

By the thirteenth section all vessels navigating the bays, inlets, rivers, harbors, and other waters of the United States are made subject to the navigation laws of the United States; and all vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and so navigating, are also to be subject to all rules and regulations consistent therewith, established for the government of steam vessels in passing, as provided in the twenty-ninth section of an act relating to steam vessels, approved the 30th August, 1852. And every sea-going steam vessel now subject or hereby made subject to the navigation laws of the United States, and to these rules and regulations, when under way, except upon the high seas, is to be under the control and direction of pilots licensed by the inspectors of steam vessels; vessels of other countries and public vessels of the United States only excepted.

The fourteenth section provides that all sea-going steamers carrying passengers, and those navigating the chain of northwestern lakes, shall have the life-boats required by law, provided with suitable boat-disengaging apparatus, so arranged as to be operative by one person, by which they may be disengaged at pleasure from the tackles by which they are lowered into the water.

By the fifteenth section it is provided that the provision for a foremast-head light for steamships, in an act entitled "An act fixing certain rules and regulations for preventing collisions on the water," approved the 29th day of April, 1864, shall not be construed to apply to other than ocean-going steamers and steamers carrying sail. River steamers navigating waters flowing into the Gulf of Mexico are to carry the following lights, namely, one red light on the outboard side of the port smoke-pipe, and one green light on the outboard side of the starboard smoke-pipe; these lights to show both forward and aft, and also abeam on their respective sides. All coasting steamers and those navigating bays, lakes, or other inland waters, other than ferry-boats, and those above provided for, are to carry the red and green lights, as prescribed for ocean-going steamers; and, in addition thereto, a central range of two white lights; the after light being carried at an elevation of at least fifteen feet above the light at the head of the vessel; the head light to be so constructed as to show a good light through twenty points of the compass, namely, from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on either side of the vessel; and the after light to show all around the horizon.

The sixteenth section provides that the annual compensation paid to steamboat inspectors shall be hereafter as follows: to each local inspector for the districts of New York, New Orleans, and San Francisco, $2,000; for the districts of Philadelphia, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Pittsburg, $1,800; for the districts of Baltimore, Louisville, Buffalo, Detroit, and the assistant inspectors at New York, $1,500; for the districts of Boston, Chicago, Galena, Mobile, and Portland, in Oregon, $1,200; for the districts of New London, Memphis, Wheeling, and Cleveland, $1,000; for the districts of Portland, in Maine, Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, Galveston, Nashville, Oswego, and Burlington, $600; to the supervising inspector of the Pacific coast, $2,500; to other supervising inspectors, $2,000 each.

The seventeenth section provides for the appointment, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, of one clerk each in the local offices at New York and New Orleans, and one clerk for the board of supervising inspectors, to be under the direction of the secretary of the board; and the annual compensation allowed to these clerks is to be $1,000 each. And one additional inspector of boilers is to be appointed for the district of New York, who is to be allowed a compensation of $1,500 per annum.

The eighteenth section repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

The Committee on Commerce reported the bill with several amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line five, after the word "commerce," to insert the words "wrongfully or unreasonably;" and in line seven after the word "license" to strike out the words "for any reason that shall be deemed insufficient, or found to be untrue in fact, by any supervising inspector or board of local inspectors to whom complaints shall be made;" so that the section will read:

That if any engineer or pilot, licensed in pursuance of law by any inspector or board of inspectors shall, to the hindrance of commerce, wrongfully or unreasonably refuse to serve as such on any steam vessel, as authorized by the terms of his license, or shall fail to deliver to the applicant for such services, at the time of such refusal, if the same shall be demanded, a statement in writing, signed by such engineer or pilot, of the reasons therefor, or if any pilot shall refuse to admit into the pilot-house with him any person or persons whom the captain or owners of any steamboat may desire to place there for the purpose of acquiring the knowledge of piloting, his license shall be immediately revoked.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out at the end of the first section the words "his license shall be immediately revoked" and to insert the following words:

He shall forfeit and pay to the party aggrieved thereby the sum of $300 to be recovered in an action of debt founded on this statute. And thereupon on such recovery, as well as on such refusal to give such statement in writing, or to admit such persons into the pilot-house as aforesaid, his license shall be immediately revoked, upon the same proceedings as are provided by law in other cases of the revocation of such licenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line eleven, to strike out the word "fifty" before the word "pounds," and to insert the word "twenty;" and also to strike out at the end of the section the following words, "and the temperature of the water used in applying the hydrostatic test shall in no case exceed one hundred degrees Fahrenheit;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when boilers are so arranged on a steamer that there is employed a water connecting-pipe through which water may pass from one boiler to another, there shall also be provided a similar steam connection, having an area of opening into each boiler of at least one square inch for every two square feet of effective heating surface contained in any one of the boilers so connected, half the flue and all other surfaces being computed as effective. And no boiler shall hereafter be allowed, under the rule now established by law, a greater working pressure than one hundred and twenty pounds to the square inch.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line nine, to strike out the words "instead of;" and in line ten to strike out the words "high-pressure boilers, there shall be employed plugs or rivets of pure tin, inserted in such places and in such manner as shall be prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors," and to insert "boilers shall be fusible, as now required by law, and at a temperature not exceeding four hundred and forty-five degrees of the Fahrenheit thermometer;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That one or more additional safety-valves, of such dimensions and arrangement as shall be prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors, shall be placed on the boilers of every steamer, and shall be loaded to a pressure not exceeding five pounds above the working steam pressure allowed, and shall be secured by the inspector against the interference of all persons engaged in the management of the vessel or her machinery. And the alloyed metals now required by law to be placed in or upon the flues of boilers shall be fusible, as now required by law, and at a temperature not exceeding four hundred and forty-five degrees of the Fahrenheit thermometer; and a good and reliable water-gauge and a full set of gauge-cocks shall be provided for each boiler, whether connected or otherwise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line five, after the word "and" to insert the words "every steamboat boiler hereafter built;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no steamboat boiler hereafter built, to which the heat is applied on the outside of the shell, shall be constructed of plates of more than three tenths of an inch in thickness, the ends or heads of the boiler only excepted. And every steamboat boiler hereafter built, if employed on rivers flowing into the Gulf of Mexico, or their tributaries, shall have not less than three inches of clear space for water between and around its internal flues. And steamers hereafter built, which shall employ four or more boilers set in a battery, shall have the same divided in such a manner that one half, as nearly as may be, of the number of boilers employed will act independently of the other half, so far as relates to the water connection; but the steam from all the boilers may be connected as provided by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section five, line one, after the word "that" to strike out the words "baled hay or straw" and to insert "cotton, hemp, hay, straw, or other easily ignitable commodity;" in line four, after the word "passengers" to insert "except on ferry boats crossing rivers, and then only on the stems of such boats;" and in line seven, after the word "canvass" to insert "or other proper material;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That cotton, hemp, hay, straw, or other easily ignitable commodity shall not be carried on the decks or guards of any steamer carrying passengers, except on ferry boats crossing rivers, and then only on the stems of such boats, unless the same shall be protected by a complete and suitable covering of canvass or other proper material, to prevent ignition from sparks, under a penalty of $100 for each offense. Nor shall coal oil or crude petroleum be hereafter carried on such steamers, except on the decks or guards thereof, or in open holds, where a free circulation of air is secured, and at such distance from the furnaces or fires as may be prescribed by any supervisors, inspector, or any local board of inspectors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out sections six, seven, eight, and nine, in the following words:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That hereafter it shall not be lawful to transport, carry, or convey the substance or article known or designated as nitro-glycerine or glynn oil upon or in any ship, steamship, steamboat, vessel, car, wagon, or other vehicle used or employed in transporting passengers by land or water between a place or places in any foreign country and a place or places within the limits of any State, Territory, or district of the United States, or between a place in one State, Territory, or district of the United States and a place in any other State, Territory, or district thereof; and any person, company, or corporation who shall knowingly violate the provisions of this section shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $5,000, at the discretion of the court, to be recovered by an action of debt, one half to the use of the informer.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in case the death of any person shall be caused, directly or indirectly, by an explosion of any quantity of said substance or article, while the same is being placed upon or in any such ship, steamship, steamboat, vessel, car, wagon, or other vehicle, to be transported, carried, or conveyed thereon or therein, in violation of the foregoing section, or while the same is being so transported, carried, or conveyed, or while the same is being removed from such ship, steamship, steamboat, vessel, car, wagon, or other vehicle, every person who knowingly placed or aided or permitted the placing of the said substance upon or in such ship, steamship, steamboat, vessel, car, wagon, or other vehicle, to be so transported, carried, or conveyed, shall be deemed guilty of murder, and on conviction thereof shall be punished accordingly.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to ship, send, or forward any quantity of the said substance or article, or to transport, convey, or carry the same by a ship, boat, vessel, vehicle, or conveyance of any description, upon land or water, between a place in a foreign country and a place within the United States, or between a place in one State, Territory, or district of the United States and a place in any other State, Territory, or district thereof, unless the same shall be securely inclosed, deposited, or packed in a metallic vessel, separate from all other substances, and the outside of the package containing the same be marked, painted, or labelled in a conspicuous manner with the words "nitro-glycerine—dangerous." And any person, company, or corporation who shall knowingly violate the provisions of this section shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $3,000, at the discretion of the court, to be recovered by an action of debt, one half to the use of the informer.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the district court of the United States within the district in which any offence against this act shall be committed, or if committed in or upon any ship, boat, vessel, or vehicle beyond the territorial limits of any district, then within the district from which the same departed or that in which it shall first arrive, shall have jurisdiction to try and punish the offender in accordance with the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section thirteen, line three, after the words "United States" to insert the words "except vessels subject to the jurisdiction of a foreign Power and engaged in foreign trade and not owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States;" so that the section will read:

That all vessels navigating the bays, inlets, rivers, harbors, and other waters of the United States, except vessels subject to the jurisdiction of a foreign Power and engaged in foreign trade and not owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States, shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fourteen, line two, to strike out the word "steamers" and insert the word "vessels;" in line three to strike out the words "the chain of" and to insert the words "any of the northern and;" and after the word "to," in line five, to strike out the words "be operative by one person, by which they may be disengaged at pleasure from the tackles by which they are lowered into the water" and to insert the words "allow such boats to be safely launched with their complements of passengers, while such vessels are under speed or otherwise, and so as to allow such disengaging apparatus to be operated by one person disengaging both ends of the boat simultaneously from the tackles by which it may be lowered to the water;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That all sea-going vessels carrying passengers, and those navigating any of the northern and northwestern lakes, shall have the life-boats required by law, provided with suitable boat-disengaging apparatus, so arranged as to allow such boats to be safely launched with their complements of passengers while such vessels are under speed or otherwise, and so as to allow such disengaging apparatus to be operated by one person disengaging both ends of the boat simultaneously from the tackles by which it may be lowered to the water.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does that require the use of a particular apparatus designated?

Mr. CRESWELL. No, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fifteen, after the word "sail," in line seven, to strike out the following words:

River steamers navigating waters flowing into the Gulf of Mexico shall carry the following lights, namely: One red light on the outboard side of the port smoke pipe, and one green light on the outboard side of the starboard smoke pipe; these lights to show both forward and aft, and also abeam on their respective sides.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section fifteen, line fourteen, to strike out the words "and those above provided for."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That supervising, and local, and assistant inspectors of steamboats shall execute proper bonds, in such form and upon such conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and subject to his approval, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of their respective offices, and the payment, in the manner provided by law, of all moneys that may be received by them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill in the fifth line of the third section, by striking out the word "five" before the word "pounds," and inserting the word "two;" so that it will read:

And shall be loaded to a pressure not exceeding two pounds above the working steam-pressure allowed.

This amendment was intended to have been reported from the committee, but appears to have been accidentally omitted in the printing of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I further move to amend the bill by striking out sections sixteen and seventeen, and inserting the following in lieu of them:

And be it further enacted, That the annual compensation paid to local inspectors of steamboats shall be hereafter as follows, namely:

For the district of Portland, in Maine, $300.
For the district of Boston and Charlestown, in Massachusetts, $1,000.

For the district of New London, in Connecticut, $500.

For the district of New York, two at $2,000 each, two at $1,500 each, and one additional inspector of boilers at $1,500.

For the district of Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania, $1,300.

For the district of Baltimore, in Maryland, $1,200.

For the district of Norfolk, in Virginia, $300.

For the district of Charleston, in South Carolina, $500.

For the district of Savannah, in Georgia, $400.

For the district of Mobile, in Alabama, $1,000.

For the district of New Orleans, in which New Orleans is the port of entry, Louisiana, $2,000.

For the district of Galveston, in Texas, $400.

For the district of St. Louis, in Missouri, $1,600.

For the district of Nashville, in Tennessee, $400.

For the district of Louisville, in Kentucky, $1,200.

For the district of Cincinnati, in Ohio, $1,000.

For the district of Wheeling, West Virginia, $500.

For the district of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, $1,600.

For the district of Chicago, Illinois, $800.

For the district of Cleveland, Ohio, $800.

For the district of Buffalo, New York, $1,200.

For the district of Oswego, or of which Oswego is the port of entry, New York, $300.

For the district of Vermont, of which Burlington is the port of entry, $300.

For the district of San Francisco, California, $1,500.

For the district of Memphis, Tennessee, $900.

For the district of Galena, Illinois, $1,000.

For the district of Portland, Oregon, $700.

And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, one clerk each in the local offices at New York and New Orleans, and the annual compensation allowed to these clerks shall be $750 each.

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury may procure for the supervising and local inspectors of steamboats such stationery, printing, instruments, and other things necessary for the use of their respective offices as may be required therefor, and shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to secure the proper execution of the steamboat acts, and may from time to time cause special examinations to be made into the administration of the inspection laws.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out, in that part of the proposed amendment which applies to the district of Portland, in Oregon, "$700," and to insert the amount provided in the original bill, "$1,200."

I find that in the proposed amendment salaries of $1,500 and $1,600 are paid to local inspectors in the Atlantic States, where, I am satisfied, the business is not as large as it is at Portland, in Oregon. In addition to that the expenses at Portland, in Oregon, are much larger than they are in places on this side of the continent. I have received communications from the local inspectors of that district representing to me that an increase in their salaries is absolutely necessary, and I do not see any reason why inspectors at Portland, Oregon, should be reduced to $700, and the local inspectors upon the Mississippi river, at some points two or three thousand miles from its mouth, should be paid $1,000, $1,200, or $1,500, when there is no point upon the Mississippi river where the business is half as large as it is at Portland, in Oregon. I therefore move this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The present amendment of the committee is made up upon a careful examination of the amount of inspection and other work done at each of the local offices at the points named, so that as near as mathematics can reach such a question, every inspector, by the amendment reported from the committee, is paid for what he does in the same ratio that every other inspector is paid for what he does. The present law went into operation in the year 1852, and for the respective periods ending in 1855, 1860, and 1865, tables have been constructed at the Treasury Department showing the number of steamboats inspected, the number of boilers inspected, the number of steamboats licensed, and the number of pilots and engineers licensed, so as to show the respective amounts of business done at each of these points; and the amendment providing for Portland, Oregon, the sum of $700 is, according to these tables, the fair ratio in proportion to the amount of labor that is done there as compared with all the other places where similar work is done, so that while New York gets a great deal more than Portland, Oregon, does, it is because a much larger proportion of the time of the inspector is required to perform the duties.

It therefore appears to me that the scale which the committee have reported based upon these considerations is as nearly accurate as it possibly can be. The committee were not satisfied with the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, and caused these tables and investigations to be made with a view to reduce the appropriation for this service to the lowest amount possible consistent with the thorough performance of the important work which these officers have to do; and upon these considerations they have directed me to propose the amendment which is now before the Senate. The total increase provided for by this amendment above the present law is only $2,700 for the whole number of inspectors for the whole United States, making $5,400 as the total annual increase of expense above the original provision made in 1852; and all that is done is to readjust, based upon the business of the last fifteen years, the scale of fees which is appropriate to each place.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he knows what the present salary of the local inspectors at Portland, Oregon, is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The present salary of the local inspector at Portland, Oregon, is $700, precisely where the committee propose to leave it. Some of the places we have not increased at all; others we have increased somewhat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know how reliable the data may be to which the Senator refers, but I am confident that if $700 was a suitable compensation to the local inspectors at Portland before this time, there ought to be an addition to that compensation, for the business has largely increased at that point, and I presume increased with as much rapidity as at any other point in the country. They are extending steamboat navigation from Portland up the Columbia river, up the Snake river, and up the various branches of the Columbia river. They are constructing new steamboats, adding very much to the steamboat navigation of that river and of that district, and the duties imposed upon these local inspectors will be very much increased, and I think there ought to be a corresponding increase of the compensation. A salary of $700 for a local inspector at that point is just about no salary at all. Possibly competent men can be secured, but I very much doubt whether the best men can be procured at that salary; and if it is desirable at all to have local inspectors of steamboats it is desirable to have the best and most competent men in the country, because the object, I suppose, in providing for those inspectors is to secure life and property on board steamers.

I depend for my information upon representations from persons in that vicinity and upon my personal knowledge of the amount of business transacted at that point and in that district. I am very sure that $700 is no adequate compensation, and it is not reasonable that it should be, because Portland and the district of which it is the center is a community that is rapidly growing in business. Business is rapidly accumulating there. Two or three years ago, when this salary was fixed, there was one steamboat where there are now half a dozen engaged in business; and either the compensation heretofore has been altogether too high and unreasonable, or this compensation provided by the amendment of the committee is not suitable to the circumstances of the country at this time. I think it is not in proportion to the salaries paid at other points. I do not know how the officer to which the Senator refers obtains information as to the amount of business in these districts, or when the reports were made upon which he relies; but I am very sure of one thing, that such a salary as it is now proposed to give these men is no salary for any business in that country where the expenses are so high. The expenses of traveling are much greater than they are here; and the expenses of living are much higher; and in every respect the salary is inadequate to the services to be performed; and I insist upon it that the salary ought not to remain at $700, and that my amendment should be adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Oregon is undoubtedly right, at least in my opinion, when he says that the salary has been either too high before or is too low now; but it appears to me that it has been too high hitherto. In the very last year—and this will show the Senate how much time is necessary to be employed to earn this $700—the total number of steamboats inspected and licensed at the port of Portland, in Oregon, was only twenty-five; and a competent man, or two competent men, because there are two in each district, can perform the work in three days, and can make their reports and answer all the questions, and do everything that is necessary, in three days more. Of course $700 is a very high compensation for a week's work; but it is true that that is not the whole question, because you cannot employ for that time, having a responsibility over the whole year, men who are fit to perform such work without paying them a salary which has some relation in amount to the dignity and responsibility of the office. So far as the absolute labor goes, the time employed to inspect these twenty-five steamers and their boilers, &c., $700 is an excessive compensation if you look at it merely in that point of view; but, as I said, the salary is made higher on account of the dignity and responsibility of the office. The cost to the Government at the port of Portland for each steamer inspected is fifty-six dollars, while the cost at Galena, where eighty-nine are inspected, is only $15 62, and so on. The real truth is, and it is impossible to disguise it or misunderstand it, that in places like Portland, and many other places in the country, the Government cannot afford to pay the amount necessary to compensate a man for all his time for a whole year, but it is expected that he will engage in other occupations. He may be a builder of steam vessels; he may be a master mechanic in some other department of industry; he may be one thing or another, whatever he pleases, so that he possesses the requisite knowledge and skill to bring to bear upon the question he has in charge whenever he is called upon. Now, looking at it in this point of view, it appears to me that we are paying for the present a sum large enough. When the business increases, let the salary be increased.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I should like to have an explanation of the reason why the compensation of the inspectors at Wheeling is reduced. While you are imposing additional duties upon these inspectors, you are cutting down their salaries one half. It strikes me that that cannot be reasonable, at all events. The inspectors at Wheeling have charge of some two hundred and fifty or three hundred miles of the Ohio river, along which at very numerous points steamboats are constantly built, and brought to Wheeling to be inspected and licensed. Again, a good deal of the great trade down the Ohio river settles at Wheeling and Parkersburg, which are both railroad termini, and all go to Wheeling for their inspection. I should like the Senator in charge of the bill to explain the reasons why the salary of the inspectors at Wheeling is cut down to $500.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My only explanation is that my friend from West Virginia is mistaken in the assumption that it is cut down. The present law gives the inspectors at Wheeling $500, precisely where we propose to leave it. The number of steamboats inspected at Wheeling in 1855 was thirty-four; in 1860, thirty-nine; and in 1865, forty-seven. That has been the total rate and amount of the increase; and, considering the great number of other inspection districts up and down the river, at Pittsburg, Nashville, Louisville, and all those places, we thought there was no justification for increasing, at this time, the compensation of the inspectors at Wheeling.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I understand that this bill provides for giving them a compensation of $1,000, and that the amendment of the Senate committee cuts it down to $500.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The original bill provided for giving them $1,000, and we have left it where the present law leaves it.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I cannot say that I know enough about the subject to make any particular opposition, but I think there is a discrimination made here that is not a just one. I can only judge from my general knowledge of the subject. I know that a good deal of this business is done at Wheeling. What it relates to, whether to hulls, or the whole inspection, or the inspections that must take place from time to time afterward, I do not know.

Mr. EDMUNDS. These tables that I read from contain the statement of every steamboat, large and small, that has been inspected at that place and reported by the inspectors. The Senate are of course aware that by the present law it is the duty of the steamboat inspectors to keep a record of every official act that they do in respect to the inspection of steamboats, hulls, and boilers, and the licensing of pilots and engineers. It is their business to make quarterly returns of them, and certain fees are assessable by law upon each steamboat owner upon inspection, depending generally upon the tonnage of the vessel. Those fees it is the duty of the inspector to account for and pay over into the Treasury. The scale of compensation which the amendment that I have proposed, for the committee, adopts, is, I repeat, adapted precisely and mathematically to the amount of labor done in each district and the amount of fees received and reported to the Treasury; so that for the same amount of time employed in Wheeling, the inspector there is paid the same compensation as is paid for the same amount of time in New York, so as to make it just, as to the time and labor and responsibility, all over the country. There is no law which prohibits a steamboat inspector from engaging in other occupations, and it is of course expected, as the fact is, that everywhere where the salary is not large enough to compensate for all the man's time, he engages in other pursuits; and undoubtedly three fourths of the steamboat inspectors of the country today are engaged in honorable and profitable occupations otherwise. For the labor which they do for the Government they ought to be, and are, liberally paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, striking out the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the bill, and inserting a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, and the Chair will take the question on the amendments collectively unless a division is asked.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to renew, in a different form, my amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont. I propose to strike out "$700" and to insert "$1,000," in relation to Portland, Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the Senator's request that amendment will be accepted, and the Chair will put the question on concurring in the residue of the amendments made in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont striking out the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the bill and inserting a substitute, and as an amendment to that amendment the Senator from Oregon proposes to strike out "$700" and to insert "$1,000" as the salary of the local inspector at Portland, Oregon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not wish to appear pertinacious about this matter; but it has occurred to my mind that in preparing his amendments, the Senator did not take into consideration the circumstances under which the local inspectors at Portland, in Oregon, are compelled to act. At points upon the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, at Wheeling, for instance, I suppose the local inspector can perform his duties at that place; but the inspector at Portland, in Oregon, inspects some of the steamboats at that city. Then there are the falls of the Willamette, in the Willamette river, that cannot be passed by steamboats, and steamboats are constructed above those falls, and it is necessary for the local inspector to go there and make his inspection. Then there are steamboats on the Columbia river below the cascades. Those are to be inspected at Portland. Then there is another portion of the river between the cascades and the Dalles where other steamboats for the navigation of the Columbia are constructed, and the inspector must go there to examine those steamboats. Then above the Dalles, there is another part of the Columbia river, where boats are constructed, and the inspector living at Portland is compelled to go above the Dalles for the purpose of inspecting those steamboats; and so upon the Snake river and the other branches of the Columbia river. There are two or three portages upon the Columbia river, and upon the branches of the river there are portages, and materials are taken up from Portland to the portions of the river above these portages, and there the boats are constructed, and it is necessary for the inspectors to go there in order to inspect those boats; so that an inspector at Portland, in Oregon, has very much more labor and must necessarily incur much more expense than an inspector living at the city of Wheeling, on the Ohio river, who, as I understand, is not compelled to travel any great distance for the purpose of discharging his duties. I am not, however, particularly advised on that subject; but I know that in Oregon the local inspectors are compelled to travel two or three hundred miles or more for the purpose of performing their duties. In addition to the other reasons that I assigned before, I think these are sufficient to induce the adoption of the amendment that I have proposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There would be some force in what my friend from Oregon says as to the paripatetic duties of the inspector at Portland were it not for the fact that all the official expenses of these inspecting gentlemen are paid by the Government—office rent, printing, stationery—everything of that multitudinous number of matters which always get into not only steamboat inspector's bills, but every other public officer's bills and traveling expenses, whatever they may be. They make up their accounts and take those items out of the fees which are paid to them by the steamboat owners and remit the balance, if fortunately there happens to be a balance, to the Government. Now, it may take two or three days more time, possibly, to make this journey than if they were all to be inspected at one place, but the increase is so small, and the salary at present is so large in proportion to the whole amount of time required, that with all respect to my friend's observations I think we should be doing injustice to the other inspectors and to the Treasury to agree to his amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have been written to from St. Louis by some persons there in regard to this bill. Various objections have been made to it, and I really have not had time to examine the bill as I should wish to do, and I do not desire that it shall pass without presenting, at least, some objections to it that have been urged in several letters that I have received, because they come from men who are perfectly conversant with matters of this character, and understand perfectly what they talk about. I desire a little while to examine the bill. I have permitted it to come to this point, and I now move to take up Senate bill No. 285.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will allow me to call up a bill which I do not think will occupy any time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It being suggested by my friend the Senator from Missouri that there are points of objections which have been stated to him, I will move that the further consideration of the bill before the Senate be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, and be made the special order at that hour. I make this motion because some parts of the bill, respecting the transportation of petroleum, it is extremely important should be passed, inasmuch as by the present law and the regulations under the law lately put in force, the owners of petroleum and the steamers engaged in that trade cannot carry it at all, and therefore it is important that the bill should be acted upon speedily. I move, therefore, that it be made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri withdraw his motion?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Missouri is withdrawn, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The chairman of the Committee on Finance gave notice this morning that he intended to call up the legislative appropriation bill to-morrow. However, as he is present, I do not wish to interfere in the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 6th instant, a copy of the report of the Board of Visitors of the United States Naval Academy for the year 1866.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that that communication be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and be printed, and that five thousand extra copies be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be printed, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The motion to print extra copies will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER LEVEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. CLARK, Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. COWAN, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. JOHNSON a select committee on the subject of extending aid for the reconstruction of levees on the Mississippi river, in pursuance of the order of the Senate of Friday last.

Mr. CRESWELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate a copy of a recent report made to the War Department by General Humphreys, of the Topographical corps, on the levees of the Mississippi river, and all other information, if any, in possession of his Department in relation to said levees.

APPROVAL OF A BILL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 8th instant, an act (S. No. 237) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha Stevens.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 660) for the relief of Captain James Starkey;

A bill (H. R. No. 661) changing the name of Emil Cohen;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 123) for the relief of Elizabeth Woodward and George Chorpennig, of Pennsylvania;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) for the relief of certain settlers on the Sioux reservation, in the State of Minnesota;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 150) to provide for payment of the claim of Colonel H. C. De Ahna for military services;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 151) authorizing the purchase of Dugan's work on Infantry Tactics; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 152) relative to certain guns captured in the late war.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed, without amendment, a joint resolution (S. R. No. 69) making an appropriation to enable the President to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 140) to grant the right of way to the Humboldt Canal Company through the public lands of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 172) to confirm the title of José Serafin Ramirez to claims in New Mexico;

A bill (S. No. 189) to confirm the grant of certain lands to José Dominguez, in California;

A bill (S. No. 261) for the relief of Mrs. Anna G. Gaston;

A bill (S. No. 321) for the relief of Maria Syphax; and

A bill (H. R. No. 255) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending June 30, 1867.

NATIONAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to take up and I desire to dispose of Senate bill No. 357.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 357) to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant to the National Telegraph Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, April 16, 1866, the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by act of Congress, and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States; but such lines of telegraph are to be so constructed and maintained as not to obstruct the navigation of such streams and waters, or interfere with the ordinary travel on such military or post roads. The corporation is to have the right to take and use from the public domain the necessary stone, timber, and other materials for its posts, piers, stations, and other needful uses in the construction, maintenance, and operation of these lines of telegraph, and may preëempt and use such portion of the unoccupied public domain through which its lines of telegraph may be located as may be necessary for its stations, not exceeding one quarter section for each station. The telegraphic communications between the several Departments of the Government of the United States and their officers and agents, in their transmission over the lines of the company, are to have priority over all other business, and to be sent at rates to be annually fixed by the Postmaster General. The rights and privileges hereby granted are not to be transferred by the company to any other corporation, association, or person, without the consent of Congress; but the United States may at any time after the expiration of five years from the passage of the act, for postal, military, or other purposes, purchase all the telegraph lines, property, and effects of the company at an appraised value, to be ascertained by five competent, disinterested persons, two of whom are to be selected by the Postmaster General of the United States, two by the company, and one by the four so previously selected. Nothing contained in the act is to be so construed as to prevent Congress from granting to other telegraph companies such powers and privileges as it confers; and Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Mr. MORRILL. It seems to me this is a very important bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can explain it in a moment. I will state briefly the reasons that led the special committee to report this bill after a very careful and patient examination of this subject. We all desired to expedite or facilitate, if possible, the construction of telegraph lines in the United States. There were three propositions made to the committee. One was that the United States itself, through the Postmaster General, should construct telegraph lines with a view to compete with existing lines; another was that we should organize a company, chartered by an act of Congress, and authorize that company to construct telegraph lines. The objection taken by the Postmaster General to the first proposition, and in which we all concurred, was that the expense would be too great for the United States now, upon present information, to embark in the construction of telegraph lines in the United States; that it would be ingrafting a new feature on the postal service which we were not prepared for. We supposed that a time might arrive, in the not far distant future, when the United States might be disposed to ingraft the telegraph system upon the postal system, but we thought that now was not the time.

The next proposition—and such a bill was introduced and referred to the committee—was that a corporation should be created by Congress invested with powers to construct telegraph lines to compete with existing telegraph companies. After a patient examination, we thought that at present we had better not organize such a company, as it would be a new feature to incorporate a company in the District of Columbia to exercise powers beyond the District, and we supposed it would give rise to some objection from its very novelty.

The bill that we finally agreed upon authorizes an existing company organized in the State of New York, which is now constructing telegraph lines in the United States and which proposes to construct a telegraph line to California over the public domain, to construct their line along the military or post roads of the United States, and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States, and authorizes them to take a quarter section of land in certain cases, and to take the materials for building their line on the public domain. This provision is copied from the act incorporating the Pacific Telegraph Company, to which the United States now pays a bounty of $40,000 a year. This confers simply the right upon this company to cross the public domain; and, wherever stations are necessary, to preempt a quarter section of land, giving them no other privilege. The second section authorizes the Postmaster General—

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to call the Senator's attention to that point in the first section to which he has just referred. I think it would be better to insert "lands subject to preemption." It would hardly do to let this company preempt land across the continent which is not subject to preemption. "Public domain" does not necessarily mean "public land subject to preemption."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to an amendment of that kind. The purpose is simply to give them the same privileges which were given to the other companies.

Mr. POMEROY. Let them take the right to preempt land which is subject to preemption, but not military reservations or Indian reservations.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the language copied from the old law; but the Senator may modify it so as to obviate the difficulty he seems to apprehend. We simply desired to give them the right to go upon public land which is not yet sold and there establish their line.

The second section provides that the Postmaster General shall fix the price for transmitting messages sent by or to any officer of the Government. This we regarded as a very important principle to be adopted. It was proposed, indeed, to extend the principle to all messages sent over the wires; but as the existing companies are not restrained in this way, it was deemed unwise to put this company under such heavy restraints, but simply to place the messages of the United States, sent either to or by an officer of the Government, under the direction of the Postmaster General.

The third section provides for an apprehended difficulty. It was alleged that these rights might be transferred to the existing companies and thus might create even a greater monopoly; but it is to be observed that no right is conferred by this bill that does not already exist in the present companies. But to avoid any difficulty on that point, on the motion of my friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] who is not now present, the third section was inserted providing that this company should not transfer the franchises conferred by the bill without the consent of Congress. It is also provided that at the expiration of five years Congress may, if they choose, purchase upon equitable terms the lines of the company.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the exact provision on that point?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is:

Provided, however, That the United States may, at any time after the expiration of five years from the date of the passage of this act, for postal, military, or other purposes, purchase all the telegraph lines, property, and effects of said company at an appraised value.

And the mode of appraisement is pointed out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the Senator whether the committee considered the question of the right of Congress to grant privileges of this kind. The Constitution gives to Congress power to establish post roads; and they may therefore provide for designating roads for postal purposes; but can they give to a company the right to establish posts, wires, over land which they do not own and over which they simply have the right themselves to establish post roads?

Mr. SHERMAN. We considered that matter. I have no doubt on that point myself, though I do not know that I can say for the committee that they came to a definite conclusion in regard to it. For myself, I have no doubt that the Government of the United States have a right to erect wires, or authorize them to be erected by a company, over and through the post roads in the different States. The mere fact that after transmitting our own dispatches, in which we get priority in all cases, dispatches are also to be transmitted for private individuals, would not affect that right. At any rate it is a right that, if disputed in any State, or by any person, may be made the subject of litigation, and may properly be left with the judicial tribunals.

The fourth section provides that Congress may grant the same rights to any other company, and may alter, amend, or repeal this act. I would at any time, on the request of any company, be willing to extend the same privileges to them. This will undoubtedly enable this company and all companies that may come in hereafter to compete with existing monopolies to have the advantage, at any rate, of going over the public domain, and of the facilities granted by the first section, and it will give them whatever right Congress can confer to go through the different States, and especially across the navigable streams of the United States. No private company can now cross the Ohio river or other navigable streams without the consent of Congress. That has been settled not only by our own practice, but by the decisions of the courts, particularly if the crossing might possibly obstruct the navigation of the river. It was deemed important, therefore, that this right should be given to the company in all cases to cross navigable streams in such a way as not to injure the navigation.

I have now stated the whole bill. I only regret for myself that it does not contain more which would enable a more complete competition with existing companies. The Postmaster General in a letter which is lying on the table has furnished a vast amount of material, statistics, &c., as to the cost of telegraphs and as to the price at which messages may be conveyed, inclosing communications from all the existing telegraph companies; but as they do not affect the provisions of this bill we have not deemed it necessary to allude to them. I will state further that the Postmaster General, to whom this bill has been submitted, cordially approves it, although he is opposed to the United States now embarking in a general system of building telegraph wires.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope this bill will receive the consideration of the Senate before it is passed. It cannot be doubted that it is a bill very important in its provisions, and that it has a very broad scope and meaning. In the first place, it seems to me, before such powers are granted, we should know something of the corporation to which they are to be granted. It will be seen that this National Telegraph Company is described as "a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, April 16, 1866"—only a little over a month ago. By the general laws of that State a certain number of persons may associate themselves together and exercise the general powers of a body politic and corporate. Now, I hardly think that the Government of the United States would like to grant powers so extensive as these without knowing something of the corporation, who the corporators are, what their responsibility is, and what they purpose to do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have that information here.

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly it ought to be accessible to the Senate. This bill, I see, was reported on the 7th of June. We have had very little opportunity to consider the matter; this is the first time it has come to my attention at all.

Now, let us look at the scope of the bill for a moment. In the first place, this corporation, which is not the creature of this Government, which is the creation of the State of New York, is endowed with certain powers and privileges, first to put up telegraphic wires in any direction, to any extent, "through and over any portion of the public domain." I take it for granted that means outside of the States. That is a pretty extensive sweep when you consider that the Government at this moment is paying a subsidy of about fifty thousand dollars a year, I think, to one line, and this company may build another one right alongside of that.

But that is not the important part of this measure. The important part of it is in these words, "over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by act of Congress." What does that mean? Any of the roads over which we carry the mail, over any of your railroads or any of the ordinary public highways or turnpikes throughout the whole extent of the country. A corporation in the city of New York is invested with the high privilege of setting up telegraphic wires in any direction and in all directions throughout the whole extent of this country, over your railroads, over your turnpikes, over your ordinary highways, anywhere and everywhere where the Government of the United States has declared that it has a post road. I think that is a little broader and a little more comprehensive, perhaps, than any bill in so few words ever before proposed to invest any corporation in this country with.

Whether this Government has the power to carry the mail through the telegraph is a question, perhaps, that we are not to consider here, but it is a grave question and one that requires some little consideration before the Government enters upon it. In the first place, whether it is practicable to carry the mail by telegraphic communication has not been settled by any means. At the present rates, no one would pretend that it could be done. It is a very grave question whether the Government should enter upon the consideration of the project of carrying its mails over and by means of telegraphic lines.

Now, sir, if we were entering upon that question, I think the honorable Senator from Ohio would agree with me that it presented a matter of the gravest consequences, and which should not be passed upon by the Senate in a moment, nor without full and serious consideration. It would involve, of course, the entire revision of the whole subject of postal arrangements. I infer from the remarks of the honorable Senator that this bill is presented in contemplation of some such thing in the future. But that is not the question of authority to which I now call the attention of the Senate. That is not the precise question involved here. The question which is involved here, and which to my mind is very doubtful, is the one hinted at by my colleague: has the Government of the United States the authority to invest a private corporation in the city of New York (for that is what it is) with the power to make lines of telegraphic communication in any direction and in all directions over the whole length and breadth of this country, not for postal, not for military, but for its own purposes? That is exactly what it is. This bill proposes to invest a private corporation of the State of New York with power to set up telegraphic communication all over this country. Have we any authority for that? The honorable Senator says that the corporation exists. True, but it has not this power.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to remind the Senator that the present monopoly that now controls all the telegraph wires of this great country is in the hands of a single corporation chartered by the State of New York, just like this company; and the only question is, whether we shall leave them in the ascendant, sole possessors of the field, or whether we shall, if we can, create competition.

Mr. MORRILL. That company, I suppose, has its rights by virtue of the legislation of the several State Legislatures. There is no objection, of course, to a private corporation of the State of New York undertaking to build telegraphic lines of communication throughout the several States, provided that they do it with the consent of these States; but the question here is, whether the Congress of the United States can authorize a private corporation to construct and maintain telegraph wires independent of the authority which they may receive from the States. That is the question, for it will be seen that the bill proposes to invest this private corporation of New York with the right "to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by act of Congress, and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States."

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Ohio, with the consent of the Senator from Maine, whether he desires to proceed with the consideration of this bill to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. If any other Senator desires time to look into it, I am willing that it shall go over; but I should like to hear the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL. I prefer that the bill should go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. I will agree to postpone the matter.

The motion to postpone the bill was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) for the relief of certain settlers on the Sioux reservation, in the State of Minnesota—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 150) to provide for payment of the claim of Colonel H. C. De Ahna for military services—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 151) authorizing the purchase of Dugan's work on Infantry Tactics—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 152) relative to certain guns captured in the late war—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

LAND TITLES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 343) to quiet land titles in California. It is a bill which has been reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was introduced by Mr. CONNESS, and reported by the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first section provides that in all cases where the State of California has heretofore made selections of any portion of the public domain in part satisfaction of any grant made to that State by any act of Congress, and has disposed of the same to purchasers in good faith under her laws, the lands so selected shall be confirmed to the State. It is, however, provided that no selection made by the State contrary to existing laws shall be confirmed by this act for lands to which any adverse preemption, homestead, or other right has, at the date of the passage of the act, been acquired by any settler under the laws of the United States, or to any lands which have been reserved for naval, military, or Indian purposes by the United States, or to any mineral land, or to any land which, at the time of the passage of the act, was included within the limits of any city, town, or village, or within the county of San Francisco.

By the second section, where the selections named in section one have been made upon land which has been surveyed by authority of the United States, it will be the duty of the proper authorities of the State, where the same has not already been done, to notify the register of the United States land office for the district in which the land is located of such selection, which notice shall be regarded as the date of the State selection, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office is to instruct the several local registers to forward to the General Land Office, after investigation and decision, all such selections, which, if found to be in accordance with section one, the Commissioner shall certify over to the State in the usual manner.

Under the third section, where the selections named in section one have been made from lands which have not been surveyed by authority of the United States, but which selections have been surveyed by authority of and under the laws of the State, and the land sold to purchasers in good faith under the laws of the State, such selections shall, from the date of the passage of this act, when marked off and designated in the field, have the same force and effect as the preemption rights of a settler upon unsurveyed public land; and if, upon a survey by the United States, the lines of the two surveys shall be found not to agree, the selection shall be so changed as to include those legal subdivisions which nearest conform to the identical land included in the State survey and selection. Upon the filing with the register of the proper United States land office of the township plat in which any such selection of unsurveyed land is located, the holder of the State title shall be allowed the same time to present and prove up his purchase and claim under this act as is allowed preëmptors under existing laws; and if found in accordance with section one of this act, the land embraced therein shall be certified over to the State by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The fourth section provides that in all cases where township surveys have been or shall hereafter be made under authority of the United States, and the plats thereof approved, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to certify over to the State of California, as swamp and overflowed, all the lands represented as such, upon such approved plats, within one year from the passage of this act, or within one year from the return and approval of such township plats. The Commissioner shall direct the United States surveyor general for the State of California to examine the segregation maps and surveys of the swamp and overflowed lands made by the State; and where he shall find them to conform to the system of surveys adopted by the United States, he shall construct and approve township plats accordingly, and forward to the General Land Office for approval. In segregating large bodies of land, notoriously and obviously swamp and overflowed, it shall not be necessary to subdivide the same, but to run the exterior lines of such body of land. In case the State surveys are found not to be in accordance with the system of United States surveys, and in such other townships as no survey has been made by the United States, the Commissioner shall direct the surveyor general to make segregation surveys, upon application to the surveyor general by the Governor of the State, within one year of such application, of all the swamp and overflowed land in such townships, and to report the same to the General Land Office, representing and describing what land was swamp and overflowed under the grant, according to the best evidence he can obtain. If the authorities of the State shall claim as swamp and overflowed any land not represented as such upon the map or in the returns of the surveyors, the character of such land at the date of the grant, September 28, 1850, and the right to the same, shall be determined by testimony, to be taken before the surveyor general, who shall decide the same, subject to the approval of the Commissioner.

The fifth section makes it the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to instruct the officers of the local land offices and the surveyor general, immediately after the passage of this act, to forward lists of all selections made by the State referred to in section one, and lists and maps of all swamp and overflowed lands claimed by the State, or surveyed as before provided in the act, for final disposition and determination; and if such final disposition shall not be made within one year from and after the receipt at the General Land Office of any such list or map, the title of the State of California to the lands embraced in any of such lists or maps shall be complete and final.

The sixth section proposes to construe the act to provide for the survey of the public lands in California, the granting of preemption rights therein, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1855, so as to give the State of California the right to select for school purposes other lands in lieu of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections as were settled upon prior to survey, reserved for public uses, covered by swamp lands or grants made under Spanish or Mexican authority, or by other private claims, or where such sections would be so covered if the lines of the public surveys were extended over such lands, which shall be determined whenever township lines shall have been extended over such land, and in case of Spanish or Mexican grants, when the final survey of such grants shall have been made. The surveyor general of the State of California is to furnish the State authorities with lists of all such sections so covered, as a basis of selection. But the State of California is authorized to provide by law for the investment of all moneys derived from the sale of school lands in a permanent productive fund; the proceeds of which shall be forever applied, under the direction of the Legislature of said State, to the use and support of public schools in the several school districts in that State and to no other use or purpose whatsoever; and the previous application in such manner by the State of California of funds derived from the sale of such lands is ratified and confirmed, so far as the assent of the United States to the same may be necessary to the confirmation thereof.

The seventh section provides that where, in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, persons have purchased lands of Mexican grantees, which grants have subsequently been rejected, and have used, improved, and continued in the actual possession of the same, and where no valid adverse title (except of the United States) exists, such purchasers may purchase the same, after having such lands surveyed under existing laws, at the minimum price established by law, upon first making proof of the facts, under regulations to be provided by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Under the eighth section, in all cases where a claim to land by virtue of a right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican authorities has been finally confirmed, and a survey and plat thereof shall not have been made, as provided by sections six and seven of the act of July 1, 1864, to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the State of California, and in all cases where a like claim shall hereafter be finally confirmed, and a survey and plat thereof shall not be made as provided by those sections within six months after final confirmation, it shall be the duty of the surveyor general of the United States for California to cause such survey and plat to be made as soon as practicable, and to return the same to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington; and for the expenses of each survey and plat made, and of the publication required by the act of July 1, 1864, the surveyor general is to be paid from the appropriations for the surveys of the public lands in California.

The ninth section provides that from the decrees of the district courts of the United States for the district of California, approving or correcting the surveys of private land claims under Spanish or Mexican grants, rendered after the 1st day of July, 1865, an appeal shall be allowed for the period of one year after the entry of such decrees to the circuit court of the United States for California, as provided by section three of the act of July 1, 1864, to expedite the settlement of titles to land in the State of California, and the decision of the circuit court shall be final.

The tenth section declares that if, upon final investigation and decision, it shall be determined that there has been confirmed to the State of California by this act more land than under the several grants made by Congress it is entitled to, the State shall pay into the sub-Treasury of the United States at San Francisco a sum equal to $1.25 per acre for each and every acre so confirmed in excess of any such grant or grants, such payments to be made within one year of such final decision.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was in section one, line fourteen, after the word "military" to insert "or."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This verbal amendment will be made without a vote, there being no objection.

The next amendment was in section five, line eight, after the word "determination" to strike out:

And if such final disposition shall not be made within one year from and after the receipt at the General Land Office of any such list or map, then the title of the State of California to the lands embraced in any of such lists or maps shall be complete and final.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Which final disposition shall be made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office without delay.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section six, line nine, after the words "covered by" to strike out "swamp lands or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seven, line four, after the word "rejected" to insert "or where the lands so purchased have been excluded from the final survey of any California grant."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, line twelve, after the word "California" to strike out the words "to cause such survey and plat to be made as soon as practicable, and to return the same to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington; and for the expenses of each survey and plat made, and of the publication required by said act of July 1, 1864, the said surveyor general shall be paid from the appropriations for the surveys of the public lands in California," and in lieu thereof insert:

As soon as practicable after the passage of this act, or such final confirmation, to cause the lines of the public surveys to be extended over such land, and he shall set off, in full satisfaction of such grant, and according to the lines of the public surveys, the quantity of land confirmed in such final decree, and as nearly as can be done in accordance with such decree; and all the land not included in such grant as so set off shall be subject to the general laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I propose an amendment in the sixth section, to insert after the word "selection," in the eighteenth line, the words "such selections to be made from surveyed lands and within the same land district as the section for which the selection is made."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think it is possible to understand the meaning and force of that amendment unless it is explained.

Mr. CONNESS. It concerns the selections to be made in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, or "indemnity land," as it is termed technically, and requires that the selection shall be made from surveyed lands within the district in which the section cannot be already taken. It simply confines the selection to the land district in which the particular section cannot be had. I will say that it is an amendment suggested by the surveyor general of the State.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following amendment to the seventh section, to come in after the word "same" in line seven:

As conterminous proprietors according to the lines of their original purchase.

That is a mere provision regarding the administration or carrying out the act.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to hear that amendment read. I do not understand it.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senate will see that it is simply to carry out an amendment already made, that conterminous proprietors may be located together, that they may divide subsequently between themselves.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Without a further explanation I am not sure that that amendment is right. I will state to the Senate that the purpose of this section is to provide for this class of cases: many parties supposed that they had good claims under the Mexican grants in California, and that those claims had no particular location; relying upon that, they sold to different parties portions of those grants, and afterward the claims in some instances were rejected by the courts, and in some instances the lands which they had sold fell outside of their particular claims; and it was thought equitable and just that the Government should allow those parties where their titles thus failed to become the purchasers from the Government, without any restriction such as is found in the preemption laws, as to quantity, to allow the parties to purchase from the Government whatever amount they had purchased from the supposed grantees, and thus get a good title. But it was thought proper to limit the right to purchase to the amount actually occupied and improved by the parties. Now, if the amendment of the Senator from California goes to the extent of allowing parties to purchase whatever they have occupied and improved, and also adjoining lands, it was not the purpose of the committee to extend the relief that far.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say to the Senator simply that it is not intended and cannot give them the right to purchase any additional land. If the Senator desires to hear it, I will have read a petition which has come to me, which involves just this class of cases, from a number of settlers on one of these grants. I think it is well for the Senate to hear it; and I propose offering a further amendment, as called for by this petition. I send it to the desk, and ask the attention of Senators to its reading. It is signed by a number of settlers on one of these pieces of land.

The Secretary read the following petition:

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, citizens of Sutter county, California, have learned with pleasure the news that you have introduced a bill in the United States Senate having for its object the quieting of land titles in California. If that bill becomes a law it will undoubtedly be of great benefit to the people of this State, but before your petitioners can derive a benefit from it—perhaps there are others in our situation—section four [which corresponds with section seven of this bill] would have to be so modified that it reads, after having such lands surveyed under the existing laws, thus: "or in cases where the general system of the United States surveys is not applicable, it shall be the duty of the surveyor general, upon presentation of a petition setting forth sufficient reason for deviating from that system and signed by all parties interested, to have a survey made in accordance with said petition."

As a reason for such modification, permit us to state that we have purchased in good faith lands always considered to be within the New Helvetia grant, but which in the final location of it were not included. We bought at an early day, before any Government lines were established here; we were necessarily compelled to adopt the subdivision lines of the grant, it being rectangular with Feather river; our improvements were made in conformity with those lines, and the changing of them to Government lines would not only cut our farms and orchards into very bad shapes, but would create a cause of contention. We have always been in actual possession of the land, and wish to abide by the lines as held for the last sixteen years.

We therefore ask and pray that you will ingraft such a clause in the law as will meet our case and thereby conferring a great favor on us and all others in like situation.

Your petitioners shall ever pray, &c.

Hon. JOHN CONNESS, United States Senator.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state that this section is recommended by the committee for the purpose of meeting just such cases, of which this is one. There are many in the State. The language is inserted, "where the lands so purchased have been excluded from the final survey of any California grant." These are situated exactly in that way; but that would not, unless by the addition of an amendment which I am going to suggest, enable them to buy, as conterminous proprietors, the amount of land already in possession. They want the privilege by law of petitioning the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and that he shall have the power to recognize their existing lines, according to which their houses are erected, their orchards planted, and all their improvements made for sixteen years.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe I now understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, and I hardly think the Senate will be willing to go so far as he now suggests.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, I do not insist strenuously on the amendment. I am willing to withdraw it, but I will say to Senators that it simply proposes to allow two or three or more persons to buy one piece of ground, so that they may then divide according to their own lines. The Senator from Indiana is entirely in error in regard to his impressions of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator if it would not produce irregular surveys and require the surveys of the public lands according to the description in the deed from the original grantee.

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I cannot understand the language used.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the Senator that by many bills of this kind passed, there have been several, in which the improvements made were of such a character that it was necessary, we have again and again provided that the sale should be made to the parties according to their existing lines, because to divide and subdivide according to new lines would be to destroy their improvements. Those settlers whose petitions have been received desired me to present this class of amendments, and I intend to offer one to come in at the end of the section, namely:

Provided, That whenever it shall be made to appear by petition from the occupants of such lands that injury to permanent improvements would result from running the lines of the public surveys through such permanent improvements, in those particular cases the Commissioner of the General Land Office may recognize existing lines of subdivision.

It is simply an absolutely necessary provision to save them. However, if there is any objection to the amendment, as I have no feeling about the matter except the more fully to carry out the purpose, I shall not insist upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment, unless it is withdrawn.

Mr. CONNESS. It is best that the amendment be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I now offer this amendment in accordance with the prayer of the petition which has been read, to come in at the end of section seven:

Provided, That whenever it shall be made to appear by petition from the occupants of such lands that injury to permanent improvements would result from running the lines of the public surveys through such permanent improvements, the Commissioner of the General Land Office may recognize existing lines of subdivision.

It will be observed that the amendment does not propose an arbitrary rule, but upon petition of all the proprietors to the Commissioner of the General Land Office he may recognize their existing lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. In the seventh line of the seventh section the word "California" is inserted before "grant" by mistake for "Mexican." There is no such thing as a California grant, but the words should be changed to "Mexican grant."

Mr. POMEROY. That suggestion is a good one. The language came to us from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and that word escaped us.

Mr. CONNESS. It is simply a verbal error. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made.

Mr. CONNESS. I move further to amend the seventh section by inserting after the word "grantees" in the third line the words "or assigns," which were left out by an omission. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say, if I be permitted for an instant, in reference to the eighth section, that an amendment has been adopted in committee striking out all after "California" in the twelfth line to "California" in the nineteenth line, and inserting what is printed in italics. This is an amendment that was prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. My own opinion is that it is not an improvement of the bill. I think it ought not to be there; yet, at the same time, I have no desire to oppose his amendments. This bill has been under consideration, or bills like it, for which this is a general compromise, for four months past, and we are so anxious to get a settlement of these questions that I do not feel disposed to quibble or find unnecessary fault with any of the amendments proposed; but this is an amendment that, in my opinion, is objectionable and injurious and ought not to be made. I call the attention of the Senators who have considered it to it; yet I am not strenuous about it, as I before stated.

Mr. POMEROY. That amendment, as the Senator says, was inserted at the request of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and prepared by him. The committee considered it at considerable length, and it was thought by a majority of the committee that the Commissioner of the General Land Office was right, that we ought to insert the provision. It is on that account that it was inserted.

Mr. CONNESS. I am satisfied.

Mr. POMEROY. I will say that this subject of quieting land titles in California has been before the committee for years, and this is the first time we have ever been able to agree with the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the friends of this measure and the enemies of the measure. This is a sort of compromise bill. After three or four sessions of the committee this year, and as many every year since I have been in the Senate, and the whole matter being referred twice or three times to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, he finally sent us this bill with the amendments as meeting the approval of that department.

Mr. CONNESS. He has also sent a letter—has he not?—with it.

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, a letter asking for the passage of this bill. It is in that spirit that we have presented it, and it is in that spirit that we hope it will pass.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. When the particular amendment now referred to was before the committee I was not in favor of it. It was understood in committee that the practical effect of it would be this: where a Mexican grant has been confirmed by the courts in a particular shape, an irregular shape, this amendment would require that rectangular lines should be run over it, and the grantee compelled to take, in lieu of the particular piece of land confirmed to him by the court, an equal quantity of land under our rectangular surveys. The understanding I had, I think from the Senator from Indiana, was that these grants were confirmed by metes and bounds in irregular shapes, and that this amendment was an attempt on the part of Congress to change the form and shape and give to a particular grantee other lands in lieu of those confirmed to him by the courts. I did not suppose we had authority to do that. I learn from the Senator from California, however, that the information given on that point was mistaken information, and that the grants confirmed to these men were not of specific lands of a particular shape.

Mr. CONNESS. I will explain as briefly as I can. When the title of a grantee or petitioner is confirmed it is never confirmed to any particular land, but to a given quantity, a given number of leagues, within certain boundaries that are named in the original expediente or grant made by the Mexican Government to the party. After that, it becomes another and separate question as to where, within those exterior bounds or limits, the given number of leagues confirmed shall be located; and under a former law of Congress that duty was devolved upon the surveyor general for the Government in California, who would go forward and make a plat, usually starting to make the quantity from whatever residence or location there had been made upon the ground, he being required, under the law, to make the location of land as nearly as possible in a compact body. Then the plat of the surveyor general was sent up to the Land Office, and if approved by the Commissioner, a patent issued to the grantee for that specific descriptive quantity of land. Subsequently the law was changed and it was ordered that these questions of survey should be appealable from the act of the surveyor general to the United States district court for the district, and thence to the Supreme Court of the United States, and subsequently again the law was changed and remanded back to its former position, and that is the law now.

The object of this amendment is simply to compel the grantees who have had their claims confirmed, and then their surveys confirmed in addition, to have the survey made so that the surplus land shall be added to the public domain. Under the laws and the decisions of the courts in the State of California, until the segregation is made, the grantee may commence proceedings in our State courts and dispossess every person who may occupy any portion of the surplus land. A resolution was passed by the last Legislature of California asking that a provision of this kind should be enacted so as to compel the survey of these grants that the public might know what was private and what was public land. As between this amendment and the language for which it is substituted, it is a mere choice of words, and I have no objection to either form of expression.

Mr. HARRIS. I can see no appropriateness or fitness in the proviso at the end of the sixth section; it might be proper enough in a separate bill in relation to that subject. I move, therefore, to strike it out.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

Provided, That the State of California shall be, and is hereby, authorized to provide by law for the investment of all moneys derived from the sale of school lands in a permanent productive fund; the proceeds of which shall be forever applied, under the direction of the Legislature of said State, to the use and support of public schools in the several school districts in said State and to no other use or purpose whatsoever; and the previous application in such manner by the State of California of funds derived from the sale of such lands is hereby ratified and confirmed, so far as the assent of the United States to the same may be necessary to the confirmation thereof.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree with the honorable Senator from New York that this is a surplus provision, entirely unnecessary and uncalled for. It is not of my production; it did not occur in my bill. It is, however, a provision to which we have no objection, as it is what the State has done and proposes to do, and therefore I was willing to let it pass. I have no care as to whether it be stricken out or retained.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I feel it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the last section, which reads:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That if, upon final investigation and decision, it shall be determined that there has been confirmed to said State by this act more land than under the several grants made by Congress it is entitled to the State shall pay into the sub-Treasury of the United States at San Francisco a sum equal to $1 25 per acre for each and every acre so confirmed, in excess of any such grant or grants, such payments to be made within one year of such final decision, in such manner as the President or Commissioner of the General Land Office may direct.

I believe that section was prepared at the General Land Office; and when the question was considered in committee I was not able to see, nor am I now able to see, how Congress may impose a duty upon the State of California to pay money into the national Treasury; upon what principle Congress may assert as against a State its obligations to pay money into the Treasury, and provide that that money shall be paid in within a limited time. The purpose of this bill is to confirm to certain citizens in the State of California their land titles. If we confirm to the citizens of California a larger amount of land than the State of California under the various grants is entitled to receive, can we make it a condition that the State shall pay a certain sum of money into the national Treasury? This section asserts an obligation against the State. Suppose the State does not pay the money, how are we to enforce it? Shall Congress place upon the statute-book an obligation against a State which it cannot enforce, and which the State in all probability will not regard? Instead of that, I think it is better to provide thus at the close of the first section:

And provided further, That the State of California shall not receive under this act a greater quantity of land for school or improvement purposes than she is entitled to under existing laws.

I understand the purpose of this act to be to relieve titles in California from the irregularity of the proceedings of the authorities of that State. For instance, the General Government gave the State of California, along with other States, five hundred thousand acres for internal improvement purposes. Instead of selecting that land in place by the authorities of the State, the State sold certificates, in what quantity I do not know, but sold certificates to her citizens, and the citizens located the certificates upon lands which had not been surveyed by the General Government, but had been surveyed by the State of California. Of course here was a conflict between the proceedings of the General Government and those of the State. To the extent of that five hundred thousand acres it is proper that we should settle the controversy; but is it the purpose of Congress by this remedial act to give the State more than the five hundred thousand acres? If the State has sold certificates to a greater amount than five hundred thousand acres, is it the purpose here to confirm beyond the five hundred thousand acres?

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree entirely with the Senator that his amendment is better than the section. The section finds its way here simply from a desire on the part of California to show that they want no gain that is not theirs. That is all. I think the amendment of the Senator is a very much better provision confining the amount.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it meets the judgment of the Senator from California, I presume there will be no objection. So I move to strike out the tenth section as being inconsistent in my judgment with the relations that ought to exist between a State and the General Government, and to insert in lieu thereof the following proviso to the first section:

And provided further, That the State of California shall not receive under this act a greater quantity of land for school or other purposes than she is entitled to under existing laws.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am not certain that the proviso will answer the purpose; nor do I think there is any practical difficulty in the tenth section. It occurred in the State of Iowa, in making the selections there, that more lands were selected for school purposes by the State and confirmed to the State than the amount to which the State was entitled. I do not know how the fact occurred; but it did occur that more land was selected under the five hundred thousand acre grant than five hundred thousand acres, and there was more confirmed to the State than five hundred thousand acres. After the confirmation to the State the State went on and sold the land to individuals and received the money, and when, long afterwards, it was ascertained that the State had received more than her due proportion of land, there was no difficulty between the United States and the State of Iowa in having the money refunded by the State of Iowa to the United States. It was done. It was an obligation resting upon the State of Iowa to refund. There being a grant of five hundred thousand acres to her, five hundred and fifty thousand acres say were confirmed to her, and she had sold it; she had in trust in her hands the money for the excess, and that money she of course paid over, as in good faith she was bound to do, to the United States. The tenth section but affirms in this bill that where land is thus by mistake given to the State of California, and used by her, she shall in good faith upon her part repay to the United States the value of it. I do not think there can be any harm in it or any difficulty arise under it.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that he except the word "existing" from his amendment so as to read without the word "existing."

Mr. HENDRICKS. How will it then read? The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. Say "by law" instead of "under existing laws," because this act itself is a confirmation to the extent of these grants.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will modify it so as to say "by law."

Mr. CONNESS. I will say in addition that I was quite aware of what the honorable Senator from Iowa has said, that this matter of settlement as to the surplus or excess is a matter of mutuality frequently between the General Government and the States. Some of the western States now are found to be entitled to an additional amount of lands in lieu of swamp lands, lands that are found subsequently to be swamp lands, and thus lands properly belonging to the States under former grants which the General Government has sold and received the money for; and the Land Office now is handing over to those States lands in lieu of them. This system of settlement and mutuality is carried out regularly; but as we are providing here for confirming the titles of the State of California or the locations under State authority, and as it is within my knowledge that the State has not sold to its own citizens in any case under any of the grants up to the amount allowed to them by law, I think the provision as to that State is complete in its character, and I prefer it to the section in the bill, because that section is really unnecessary, and we only suggested it as a provision showing that we wanted no more land than we were entitled to.

Mr. HARRIS. What has been said by the Senator from Iowa has satisfied me of the propriety of retaining the tenth section. I prefer it very much to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CONNESS. So far as we are concerned, I do not care which is adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I feel it my duty to read to the Senate a dispatch from California which has been received by the Presiding Officer of the body, and handed to me for that purpose. It is dated the 29th of May, and addressed to Hon. LA FAYETTE S. FOSTER, President of the Senate:

"The passage of Senate bill two hundred and six"—which was upon this subject—

"will involve preceptors in endless litigation. Do not pass it."

This is signed by Isaac Hobbs, chairman of the Soscol Settlers' Association. I have given, it is proper to say, all the consideration to this dispatch that I thought it was entitled to, and the committee have labored to free the bill from the objections which this party seems to have anticipated. I certainly should not vote to confirm a title irregularly obtained through the State of California, as against a rightful settler; but I think the proviso to the first section sufficiently protects that class of persons; and that was the opinion of the committee. I do not know of any more important question to the people of California than the settlement of these titles. It was unfortunate that the State of California established a surveying system of her own. It was unfortunate that she did not select her lands in place; very unfortunate that she sold certificates to be located by the purchaser at his election in any portion of the State; but it has become a part of the history of the lands of that State, and we must relieve the embarrassment in regard to their titles. I reported from the committee another bill which was agreed upon by the surveyor general of California and the Commissioner of the General Land Office; but I cannot see that that is a better bill than this; perhaps not, in some of its provisions, so safe a bill. I shall support this measure.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall not detain the Senate. I am quite aware that my friend from Missouri desires the attention of the Senate upon another question, and he will excuse me for occupying a single instant upon this subject. The telegram just read is fully answered by the proviso to which the Senator from Indiana has referred; and I simply desire to say, that it may go upon the record, that I would not vote to confirm to the State of California or to any of its people, an acre of land which was settled upon by a man who had undertaken to make his home there. My whole effort has been to give that class of persons, and the object of this bill is to give that class of persons, a title.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On consultation with the chairman of the committee, I propose in the seventh section, after the word "adverse" and before "title," in the eighth line, the words "right or."

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to that. It does not add any force to the present language.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to relieve the matter of all doubt.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed.

KANSAS AND NEOSHIO VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 285, granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad, and its extension to Red river.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When this bill was before the Senate the other day I felt it to be my duty to make some remarks with a view to showing that the bill ought not to be adopted by the Senate. I had not completed what I desired to say at the time of the adjournment on that occasion, and I will now ask the attention of the Senate for a few minutes while I add a few remarks to what I said the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not yet taken up. The question is on taking it up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought it was taken up.

The motion of Mr. HENDERSON was agreed to; and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on the last amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, which was to strike out in the eleventh section the words "may connect with the Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad at any point on the line of said road," and insert other words, so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That any railroad company chartered under any law of the United States, or of any State which may have been heretofore or shall hereafter be recognized and subsidized by any act of the Congress of the United States, may connect, unite, and consolidate with this railroad company, after the same shall be located to the valley of the Neosho river, upon just, fair, and equitable terms, to be agreed upon between the parties, and shall not be against the public interest or the interest of the United States; nor shall any road authorized to connect as aforesaid charge the road so connecting a greater tariff per mile for freight or passengers than is charged for the same per mile by its own road: And provided further, That should the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Fort Gibson Railroad Company, or the Union Pacific Railroad Company, southern branch, construct and complete its road to that point on the southern boundary of the State of Kansas where the line of said Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad shall cross the same, before the said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company shall have constructed and completed its said road to said point, then and in that event the company so first reaching in completion the said point on the southern boundary of the State of Kansas shall be authorized, upon obtaining the written approval of the President of the United States, to construct and operate its line of railroad from said point to a point at or near Preston, in the State of Texas, with grants of land according to the provisions of this bill, but upon the further special condition, nevertheless, that said railroad company shall have commenced in good faith the construction hereof before the said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company shall have completed its said railroad to said point: And provided further, That said other railroad company, so having commenced said work in good faith, shall continue to prosecute the same with sufficient energy to insure the completion of the same within a reasonable time, subject to the approval of the President of the United States: And provided further, That the right of way, when not otherwise granted in this bill, shall be obtained by said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company or either of the other companies named in this act, in accordance with the provisions of section three of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I undertook to show the other day that the State of Kansas has no claim upon the Government for any further grants of public lands to aid in the construction of railroads, and I will ask the attention of the Senate now to the last report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, from which it appears that the two roads to which there was a grant made in 1863, and their branches, would receive, according to his estimate, two million five hundred thousand acres of land; and then in addition to that there has been the grant to the Pacific railroad. The amount of land granted for that road within the State of Kansas I cannot estimate, for the Commissioner does not make a separate estimate of it; but in all to one of the roads it is thirty-five million acres, not all, of course, in the State of Kansas, but a very large amount of land goes in the State of Kansas to that work. Of course, whatever lands are used within the limits of the State of Kansas for the construction of the Pacific railroad is to be charged against that State as a grant to her, because it is a portion of her lands going to construct a very important work within her limits; so that it is impossible to estimate accurately the amount of lands already granted to the State of Kansas for railroad purposes. But, as I said the other day, some notion of it can be gathered by looking at the map of the surveys of that State that accompanies the last report. Here is one road, starting at Atchison, running in a southwesterly direction across the State. Here is another road, here is another, and here is another, [pointing out the various roads,] so that nearly the entire surface of the State is covered by grants already; and the present bill is to put a road between a road to which a grant has been already made and the Missouri boundary line, to put another road in there, in which, I say to the Senate, there is not room to locate a grant. This present proposed grant will lap on the grant made in 1863 for a number of miles. The greatest distance between this proposed road and the road to which a grant has already been made, from Lawrence south to the State line, is thirty-six miles as shown by the surveys; six townships, thirty-six miles. That is a grant of alternate sections for ten miles on each side of the road, and then outside of that ten miles for a distance to make up whatever may have been sold within that ten miles; so that there will be, but a few miles within which you can locate a road and make a grant of lands; and that entire portion of the State will be without a single acre of land which a settler can occupy at $1 25 an acre. It will be all carried up either to railroad prices or to $2 50 fixed by the laws.

I said that it was not right, in view of the fact that we had made such enormous grants to the State of Kansas, to grant the balance of the land lying nearest to the Missouri border lines. I think it is preposterous. Was it the purpose of Congress to aid in the construction of this road from Lawrence, in a southern direction, to Galveston bay? If so, will Congress now grant lands to a road running parallel with it? The greatest distance they are apart is at the starting-points—thirty-six miles—and they must of course approach each other until they meet at the southern boundary line of the State. Senators will have to examine the map to see the exact direction of these two roads. I cannot, in an argument to the Senate, explain it.

I said, in the second place, that it was not right now to make a grant to a competing road the tendency of which will be to defeat the grant made two or three years ago. Here was a grant to construct a road from Leavenworth by Lawrence to the southern line of the State of Kansas, in the direction of Galveston bay. The purpose of Congress was to encourage the construction of a great road from the Missouri river to the Gulf of Mexico. Now it is proposed to make another grant between that and the State line, which will be a competing road, which will at least impair the credit of the road to which we have already made a grant. Is that the policy of Congress? Is Congress disposed to grant lands to a railroad enterprise simply because a road can be located there? Would Senators be willing to put their own money in a road to compete with another one, running, at the greatest distance, but thirty-six miles apart, and coming together at the southern line of the State, and for very much of their length running at the distance of from ten to twelve miles from each other? Senators would not put their own money into an enterprise of that sort. Is it right to put the lands of the Government into such an enterprise?

The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] the other day, when a bill was before this body, asked the question whether that proposed bill interfered with the rights of the Indians. I call the attention of that Senator, as he is on the Committee on Indian Affairs, to the provisions of this bill. This bill contemplates the extension of this road south of the Kansas line and into and through the Indian country, as the Senator will find, commencing at the tenth line of the first section of the bill, "with a view of its extension, so as to effect a junction at Red river with a railroad now being constructed from Galveston to Red river at or near Preston, in Texas," contemplating, and, so far as Congress can, now making the grant through the Indian country.

I also call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the eleventh section of the bill. That section provides, in great detail, how the land in the Indian country is to be disposed of. I believe we have not at any time undertaken to dispose of the Indian lands where those lands have been secured to the Indians by solemn treaty. The lands lying between the State of Kansas and the State of Texas have been secured to various Indian tribes by treaties securing them, by the most emphatic language possible, from every invasion of the white man. I believe the lands are given to them in fee-simple; and a provision is found in some of the treaties, as I understand, that the white man shall for no purpose come within their country. This bill contemplates the extinguishment of the Indian title and provides in advance for the extension of the railroads and the railroad grants through the Indian country.

I intend, before the bill is disposed of, to move either that it be laid upon the table or postponed until the next session; but for the present, with a view of testing the question before the Senate whether, in the absence of a treaty authorizing it, we shall contemplate the extension of a railroad through the Indian country and a grant of lands through that country, I will move to strike out, and I close my remarks by making the motion, the following words, commencing in the tenth line of the first section:

With a view of its extension, so as to effect a junction at Red river with a railroad now being constructed from Galveston to Red river at or near Preston.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the question now before the Senate is on the last amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well; I shall offer my amendment at the proper time.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall occupy the time of the Senate but a moment. I desire to reply to what the Senator from Indiana has said, as briefly as possible. I will commence by saying that, so far as I am concerned, I have not the slightest interest in any of these three roads. There are three of them in my State pointing toward Galveston bay, and when they come together, and it is so in every State of the Union where roads come together, if there are any grants at all they do conflict with each other where they come together; but the company that gets the first grant gets the land, and then if the other companies can build their roads without lands, they are not prohibited from doing so. That is all there is in that. This bill takes away no grant from a previous company. It cannot, and does not propose to do it.

In the next place, I desire to say that the Senator from Indiana is entirely in error in his statement to-day that the State of Kansas has had such a large amount of the public lands. The road he speaks of as having so many million acres commences at Omaha, in Nebraska, and goes up the Platte river to the Pacific road, and not a foot of it is in the State of Kansas. There are two branches of that road in the State of Kansas. Those two branches together may be two hundred and fifty or three hundred miles long. Those two branches do get the land that the Senator from Indiana referred to; but not an acre of the grant to the Pacific road proper comes to the State of Kansas at all. I will read, for the benefit of the Senator from Indiana, and for the sake of correcting him, precisely how the State of Kansas does stand as compared with other States in regard to land grants. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his last Annual Report, on page 168, says that he has estimated that "there will be given to the State of Minnesota 2,600,000 acres; to the State of Wisconsin 4,430,000 acres"—twice as much as we have; "to the State of Oregon 4,796,000 acres"—twice what we have got; "and to the State of Iowa 6,751,000 acres." The State of Kansas has got 2,500,000 acres less than any other State that has got any at all in the western country. None are put down to the old States, because they do not get any. I think that is a sufficient answer to the long argument which the Senator has made twice over in the Senate on two successive days, that the State of Kansas has got a large amount of public lands, when, in truth, it has got about half what other western States have got that have got any.

The next argument of the Senator is confined entirely to the Indians. This bill does not propose to give any Indian land to the road. It only proposes to give the right of way through the Indian country; and the Senator from Indiana says that is against treaty stipulations. Now, I wish to read a few words from the treaty with the Seminoles. The twentieth article of that treaty provides:

"The United States, or any incorporated company, shall have the right of way for railroad purposes and for telegraph lines through the said Creek and Seminole country."

That is already provided for by the treaty made on the 7th of August, 1856.

Mr. HENDRICKS. How is it in the Cherokee nation?

Mr. POMEROY. The same is true of all the Indian country through which this road passes, excepting the Cherokee country. I believe a treaty for that purpose is now pending before the President. Such a treaty has been made, at any rate; but it has not been ratified by the Senate. The treaties with all the other Indian tribes on the line of this road contain special reservations of the right of way. It is also contained in the treaty with the Cherokees which has not yet been ratified by the Senate. Now, I ask, where rests the argument of the Senator from Indiana that this bill is a violation of treaty stipulations, when we have carefully inserted in every Indian treaty a provision that the United States, or any incorporated company, should have the right of way? That is all there is about it. There is no grant of the public lands in that country, but simply a right of way for this company, which is already provided for in all the treaties except that with the Cherokees; and that the Committee on Indian Affairs may put in, or strike out, just as they have a mind to do. If it is not put in, the Cherokee Council or Cherokee Legislature will have the right to give the right of way, and if it is put in, it has already been given. That is all the difference. There is no grant of land in the Indian country; nothing but the right of way, which I say is provided for in every Indian treaty but one, and that treaty we shall act upon before the session closes. So far as the grants of land to the State of Kansas are concerned, I have shown that we received less than one half of what other western States have received.

The argument of the Senator from Indiana the other day, at first, was that this bill gave too much land to the State of Kansas, and finally he closed by saying that it did not give any; that it was a sort of imposition; that it gave this company a status by pretending to give them a grant which they would not have without the act, when it really did not give them a grant. If it does not give them a grant then it does not add to the land already given. If it does give them a grant, the parties with whom they negotiate will know precisely how much is granted to them.

I will only say in closing, for I desire to obtain a vote on the bill, that there is no objection to this bill that cannot be raised against every other land-grant bill that has ever been presented. There is no objection to its form or phraseology, and the facts relating to it are precisely similar to those in relation to other land-grant bills which have passed this Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not looked into the Indian treaties, nor have I examined the line of this road, to see what Indian country it will pass through; but I know, generally, that it must pass through the Indian country, or through country set apart for the Indians which lies west of Arkansas. I should like to inquire of the Committee on Public Lands if it is not true that the Cherokees hold their lands by patent from the United States. If that is so, I should like to inquire by what authority the Congress of the United States proposes to give the right of way through that country, and take the lands belonging to those parties.

Mr. POMEROY. As I understand the question of the Senator, it is whether the Cherokees have got titles to their land.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A patent title from the Government; whether they do not own it in fee.

Mr. POMEROY. They claim to have; I do not know the fact.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, I should like to know if it is proposed to pass a bill granting the right of way two hundred feet wide through their country. You might as well grant it through the State of Maine or the State of Illinois over the private farms of individuals.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator has not noticed that we have said "with the consent of the Indian tribes." Their consent is to be had.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Can the Indian tribes give consent?

Mr. POMEROY. If they have a patent, they can.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They may, if it is not held in severalty, and they may, perhaps, by treaty dispose of their lands.

Again, I notice that in this eleventh section it is provided—

That the right of way, when not otherwise granted in this bill, shall be obtained by said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company, or either of the companies named in this act, in accordance with the provisions of section three of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

Now, is it proposed to authorize, by an act of the Congress of the United States, a company chartered by Kansas to condemn lands in Kansas, and to condemn lands in Texas, or in any other State? The bill for the construction of the Pacific railroad, a great national work in favor of which an exception was made by the Congress of the United States in order to connect the two oceans, and which runs through the Territories of the United States, contains some provision of this kind. I do not know that the Congress of the United States has ever before undertaken to authorize a chartered company to condemn lands in a State. It seems to me that should be done by State legislation.

Mr. POMEROY. This does not go through any State where there is not already a law—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly it goes through the State of Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. I say, where there is not already a law providing for condemnation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then rely on that law; do not provide that the lands shall be condemned by an act of the Congress of the United States. You need no such provision if you are going to condemn the land under the act of Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator will observe that that applies only where the condemnation is not provided for by law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. "That the right of way, when not otherwise granted in this bill, shall be obtained by said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company, or either of the companies named in this act, in accordance with the provisions of section three of an act," &c.

Mr. POMEROY. To clear it of any doubt, I will insert the words "when not otherwise provided by law."

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then the provision with regard to these connecting roads seems to me to be a very dangerous one. I know we have had in my State a great deal of controversy as to the lines of railroad, and whether companies should be authorized to build the roads just where they pleased and to connect where they pleased. There is a provision in this eleventh section broad enough to authorize the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company to build a road to connect with the Neosho Valley railroad in Kansas. It authorizes any road in the United States, as I understand it, to make a connection with this road. I do not suppose the bill is intended for any such purpose, but it seems to me it is very loosely guarded, to say the least.

I wish to throw no obstacle in the way of the grants of lands for railroad purposes in the new States. I think it has been a wise policy which has led to the granting of every other alternate section of the public lands where by such grant we have secured the construction of a road; but to grant these lands as we are now doing, without very much consideration, and granting them one after another, covering the country all over with grants which are conflicting one with another, and conflicting with the rights of the Indian tribes, to whom we have set apart these districts of country, is calculated to lead to a conflict of titles hereafter which will be productive of infinite mischief in all this new country.

My attention was called to this subject of the grant of lands through the Indian country in consequence of my being upon the Indian Committee, upon which I was placed for the first time at the present session of Congress; and I felt very much embarrassed in my action upon that committee in consequence of grants of land which have already been made through the Indian country. We find that railroad companies to whom grants of land have been made insist, and they insist with some plausibility, too, that the Congress of the United States, having granted them the right of way through the Indian country, although there is a provision in the treaty that the Indians are to be protected and no white man is to settle within the limits of the district of country set apart to them, has placed itself under obligation to the company to clear up the title and to give them the lands; and when we come to settle the Indian tribes, and make treaties with other Indian tribes, an objection is interposed at once, especially by the Senator from Kansas not now in his seat, [Mr. LANE,] that he will not consent that any more Indians shall be settled in the Indian country in Kansas. Why? Because the faith of the nation is pledged to these railroad companies and to get these Indians out of Kansas; and I might state to the Senate, if any one was paying attention to what I was saying, that the result within the last two years of these claims set up on the part of Kansas has been that fifteen hundred Indians, who were driven out of the Indian country by the war and up into Kansas, have been sent out of Kansas and back to Fort Gibson, and have been there for the last eighteen months, living in tents and fed by our supplies, without doing a thing. They have got no country, and they are just living there, camping out like soldiers around Fort Gibson. We are feeding them, or otherwise they would starve to death.

Mr. POMEROY. What has that got to do with this question?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has this much to do with it: but for these very grants insisted upon in Kansas those Indians would be making a living in Kansas, but you drove them away and would not allow them to stay there.

Mr. CONNESS. They were taken away from the settlements.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They were taken away from the settlements by stationing them around Fort Gibson under canvas tents, and they have been there for eighteen months.

Mr. CONNESS. I said they were taken away from the settlements.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is true they were driven away very frequently by the war. That is an exigency that I hope will not arise again. I only mention it as one of the difficulties that are to be met with in making these grants of way through the Indian Territory. The truth is, I do not apprehend this road is going to be speedily built through that country. I think it will be time enough to make the grant at some future time. If this bill is to pass I hope it will be guarded in these respects, and that no grant of lands will be made to take effect, and I want it in the grant itself, in the Indian country until the consent of the Indian tribes shall have been obtained.

Mr. HENDERSON. I regret very much that opposition should be made to this measure. It seems to be very strenuous. I cannot see, after the numberless railroad bills that have been passed, and the companies chartered by the Federal Government, to pass through the Indian lands, and we have sat here silently and permitted them to pass, that an objection should specially be presented in this case. The Senator from Illinois says—and that is really the only objection to the bill—that so far as the Cherokee lands are concerned we cannot grant the right of way without the consent of the Indians. If that is true, this bill does not grant it. If it is necessary to go any further, I am perfectly willing to protect the rights of the Indians. There is a right given here to condemn lands. Suppose that by the treaty we have no right to pass over those lands, of course no act that we can pass will override that treaty. We cannot take any rights away from the Cherokees. But the Senate will remember that this bill provides for a road that will pass over the lands of several tribes, and as I understand, the treaties with all the tribes guaranty the right to the United States to build a railroad whenever they see fit, with the execution of the treaty with the Cherokees; and I believe it is true, as the Senator says, that the lands have been granted by patent to the Cherokee Indians. I should like to ask the Senator, as a lawyer, whether that will prevent the United States from incorporating a company to build a road over the Cherokee country; and I should like to have an answer now, before I proceed further.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the question?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator says, in consequence of the fact that the Cherokee lands were granted by patent, that therefore he cannot see the right, if I understand him, of Congress to pass a bill incorporating a company to build a road over their lands. I ask him if it is his opinion, as a lawyer, that we are debarred in consequence merely of a patent having been granted to the lands from the right of building a railroad over their country. The Senator knows perfectly well that upon the line of the Pacific railroad, from the Missouri to the Pacific, there are dozens and dozens of tribes over whose lands the Government will have to construct the road. Now, is it possible that we are debarred the privilege of building the road merely because we have heretofore granted the lands, or even if we have patented the lands to the Indians? I do not see that their title is superior to a title granted by treaty, whether there was a patent or not. The Senator will remember that in my own State, when settling the original Spanish grants at an early day, some of them were patented and some never held any title except the title they got by act of Congress. Our supreme court decided—and it was brought to the Supreme Court of the United States and there affirmed—that the title by act of Congress was just as good and just as valid as a patent, as the act provided that a patent should be issued; that the act itself was sufficient evidence of a title.

If it be true that we are debarred from building a road across the Cherokee lands, even though we grant to the Cherokees damages for the right of way, we are in a very bad fix indeed. That would debar us from building a road to New Mexico, a thing long in contemplation, and in fact a bill for which was passed at this session. My colleague had charge of it in the Senate, and it passed here and went to the other House, and was passed there, and has been signed by the President. It provides for constructing a road from Springfield, in Missouri, the terminus of the southwestern branch in Missouri, to Santa Fé. It passes over the Cherokee country, and the bill provides for the right of way; and if the Senator's position is correct, that their lands were patented and we have no right to grant the right of way without compensation, it only amounts to this: that under the last section of this bill, the one which we are now considering, this railroad company will have to pay damages to the Cherokees, because this bill cannot override the solemn treaty with the Cherokees and does not affect their rights. The Senator may rest assured that this bill will in no particular whatever affect the rights of the Cherokees nor any other tribe of Indians where we have not the absolute right reserved by treaty regulations with them to pass over their lands. I am sure of that. As a proposition of law, it is perfectly clear. If we have patented these lands, and have not reserved the right to build railroads over them without compensation in the way of damages, of course we shall have to pay damages, and no company can go over them without paying them. The Senator did not exactly say it, but I say it is a fair assumption from his argument, and if his position be true, that because we have patented the lands instead of merely giving evidence of title through the instrumentality of a treaty, therefore we cannot build a railroad across their lands at all, we are in a very sad case. I do not know how many Indian tribes we have patented the lands to; perhaps the Cherokees and others.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In all the Indian Territory the title granted by the Government was different from the ordinary Indian title in this: to the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Seminoles, Creeks, and Cherokees the Government by treaty bound itself to grant the lands by patent in fee-simple forever. That was the way in which the title was given to the Indians within the Indian Territory. And further, we, by treaty, bound ourselves never to establish either a State or territorial government over them, but they were to be independent communities. It is proper to state, however, that since the war treaties have been negotiated, but not yet completed and confirmed, with the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Seminoles, and Creeks; and a treaty is now pending with the Cherokees which may bear, it is not improper for me to say, on the question of granting the right of way for railroad purposes.

Mr. HENDERSON. Those treaties have all been confirmed, except the one with the Cherokees.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No.

Mr. HENDERSON. Most of them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not in the Indian Territory. They have not yet been acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know what position the Senate will take in reference to this matter. If the Senate say that the Indian country is in the position of a State, that it is an independent sovereign State under the Constitution of the United States, and that it is in the situation of Illinois or Kansas, then, of course, we cannot build a railroad there without an act of incorporation from them, but surely it would not be objectionable to pass this bill, because, if that be true, this bill cannot affect it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, that may be so; it may be that, although Congress granted the right of way across my land in Illinois or his in Missouri, nothing would pass by the grant, Congress having no power to make it; but, surely, he would not advocate the passage of a law of that kind. If we have no right to pass it, I agree that in the courts the grant would amount to nothing; it would never pass title; but when that fact is stated to the law-making power, and it is shown, surely Congress would not knowingly or intentionally pass a law granting that which it had no authority to grant; and I am sure the Senator from Missouri would not advocate it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not. I think the Senator is correct in that; but if he will examine the bill he will see that it provides for passing over States and Territories and Indian territories. Now, clearly we have the right, and in some of these Indian treaties we have reserved the right, as the Senator from Kansas has shown, to build these railroads by treaty stipulations. There is another portion of it, which is independent of the Indian right, belonging to the United States; and another portion of it is in the State of Kansas. Now, we cannot say, and it is unnecessary, I think, to say, so far as this road passes through the State of Kansas, that the land condemned shall be condemned according to the laws of Kansas. That would be implied in the bill. It is unnecessary to say that, so far as this bill applies to the territory belonging to the United States, and through which we have the right to pass, in all that portion it shall be condemned in some other way, or the right of way shall be granted, and in the Indian country damages paid for the right of way. The Senator will see that the latter clause of the last section of this bill provides that "the right of way, when not otherwise granted in this bill, shall be obtained by said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company, or either of the other companies named in this act, in accordance with the provisions of section three of an act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river.'"

Wherever this bill does not grant the right of way, and cannot grant the right of way, then the right of way is to be condemned, the Senator will see. It cannot grant the right of way in Kansas—that is utterly impossible—except over the public lands. Where it is necessary to condemn the lands, they will have to be condemned according to Kansas laws. Now, when we get into the Indian Territory, whenever we come to the Cherokee lands, if they build the road at all, they must pay the Indians the damages, and the damages must be assessed according to the laws of the Pacific railroad corporation. But if the Senator's intimation be true that we cannot build across the Cherokee country without an act of the Legislature granted by the Cherokees, then of course the company would be debarred entirely; but that does not interfere with this bill, because the bill itself provides for building over all sorts of Territories of the United States. I cannot see that the bill could be changed so as to make it better adapted to the different sorts of country over which the line of road has to pass. It is utterly impossible.

The Senator from Indiana presented several objections to the bill. In the first place, he said that Kansas had had land enough. Well, sir, Kansas, I suppose, has had a good deal of land. If you were to ask my opinion about this thing, I would say that our New England friends have sat by and suffered these lands in the West to be squandered for many years unnecessarily. Since I have been a member of the Senate, I have never asked the Senate to pass one of these railroad bills. I do not ask the Senate to pass this, except at the urgent solicitation of several of my constituents from the western part of my State and the member who represents the Kansas City district. The people there are very anxious to have the privilege of building this road. I never have been in favor of this wholesale granting of the public lands. I believe that in nine cases out of ten, certainly in one half the cases, our eastern friends, in their munificence, giving away the lands to the western people, have merely given them to companies who have used them, perhaps, for their own benefit, instead of building the roads as they ought to have done. That is the experience in my own State.

The other day I spoke of our experience in the southeastern part of the State with the Cairo and Fulton Railroad Company. They not only got all our lands, but they got a large quantity of money from the State, which was not benefited by it. We did not get the railroad built, and have not got anything in return. As the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] suggests to me, our eastern friends come out and get the use and benefit of the lands. They agree to build the roads, and get possession of the lands, and then go off and fail to build the roads. I do not know but they get benefited about as much as we do in it; but I always blamed this munificence of the eastern men in making these land grants without knowing exactly how the appropriations are to be made, or whether the roads are to be built or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator throws a slight imputation on some of us, and I want to say to him—

Mr. HENDERSON. I am satisfied the Senator has no constituents out there. I believe but few come from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I want to say to the Senator, with regard to that, that my experience has been that the western gentlemen have claimed the exclusive control of the Committee on Public Lands, and they have had it and managed it in their own way. I did attempt for some years to ask questions about these things, but I met with the reply that it was mean business for eastern people to undertake to interfere with the development of the West, until at last, finding that it was of no sort of use, and that it only brought imputations and attacks upon us whenever we even ventured to ask a question or suggest that we might possibly have some interest in these lands, I gave it up and concluded that it was not worth while to contend against a current so strong. Therefore I think the western gentlemen should settle this matter among themselves, and not turn around, after they have got all the land, and blame us for not preventing them from doing so.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the Senator from Maine who sits in front of me [Mr. MORRILL] quarreled very considerably against the railroad grants until we consented to give the fishing bounties; and as a fair offset to the lands, we agreed to give them the fishing bounties; and I believe made a fair exchange. [Laughter.] We have kept up the fishing bounties and they have given us the lands. Whether they have been benefited or not, I am very certain the West has not been greatly benefited by the lands.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Missouri is mistaken in regard to our legislation on this subject. The former legislation of Congress did allow the companies to take one hundred and twenty sections of the land before they built the road, but during the last four years the legislation of Congress has been changed, and not one acre of land has been given until the road has been built continuous with the acres given. We have tied it up during the last four years. While the Senator from Iowa, Mr. Harlan, was chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, he insisted that not an acre of land should be given to any company until the road was built continuous to the acres granted, and we have lived up to it religiously. What the Senator alludes to was old legislation that was had some years ago.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from Missouri will give way, I will ask leave to move an executive session.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to leave the city to-morrow, and therefore I should like to have this bill acted upon to-day. If the Senate are going to pass it, let them pass it to-day; if not, let it go.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Some questions have been raised here in the discussion, in relation to those treaties, and perhaps we had better have an executive session, as the treaties are pending, and there may be in them something bearing upon this question of land grants.

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot, for the life of me, see how, under this bill, the Indians are to be affected. It is utterly impossible.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand that this is a railroad grant to Kansas, running southward through the eastern part of the Osage country, down to the Cherokee, Choctaw, and Chickasaw country. The Senator from Kansas will inform me whether I am correct or not. I understand it goes down the Neosho valley and runs through the Osage country.

Mr. POMEROY. It is in that neighborhood. The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor, and the motion for an executive session cannot be made without his consent.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to take up those treaties in executive session.

Mr. POMEROY. As the Senator from Missouri is going to leave the city to-morrow, I hope we shall finish the bill to-day.

Mr. HENDERSON. This bill is in the language of the numerous land-grant bills that have been passed. They have been passed again and again, and no objections have ever been made to them here; and I will simply say that there would be no objection now if there were not another road incorporated through Kansas from Lawrence down to the southern line.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will allow me, that was the very road that produced the difficulties in the Indian Committee that led me to speak of this objection in regard to going through the Indian lands. It was in consequence of that very road. That was the first I ever knew of it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am sorry it enabled the Senator to get light and information which has been used against me simply. All this light and information have certainly never been used until I got hold of this bill, and it is the first one that I have ever urged. I have doubted the whole policy during my experience here. I have urged the Senator from Maine who sits before me [Mr. MORRILL] to bring up his proposed bill, when I thought they were taking the last acre of land; but, positively, this bill does not take over five thousand acres of land, I do not suppose, in the State of Kansas. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] made his first objection the other day, that Kansas had land enough and that this was giving her a great quantity more. He had not gone very far before he said the truth of the matter was that it did not grant this company any land, but merely enabled them to go into the New York market, and swindle New York and Boston men—Yankees—pretending to have a railroad grant, when they did not have any.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As the Senator repeats what the Senator from Kansas said on that point, I will correct them both at the same time. I did not say that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have you so noted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. You have not got me right. I said the Senator from Kansas, in the advocacy of this measure, said that but from five to ten thousand acres would go to the grant, and I said that if that was true the proposed grant by Congress was a simple fraud upon the moneyed men of the country.

Mr. HENDERSON. Your case was hypothetical.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I said he said that.

Mr. HENDERSON. The truth of the matter is, there will be but very few acres of land granted to the State of Kansas. The other company from Lawrence, if they build to the southern line of Kansas first, will be entitled to the railroad grant through the Indian country; if this road gets through first it will be entitled to the grant of lands through the Territories of the United States; that is all. We only desire that the road shall be speedily built, if it can be done; and the road that gets to the southern boundary of Kansas first will be entitled to the land. That is my understanding of the provisions of this bill. It cannot grant any more lands in Kansas, because the road will go through the extreme eastern counties, where all the lands are taken up. There are no lands left in Missouri, and none in Kansas, and therefore there will be but few lands to be taken under the grant. Therefore I hope the bill may be passed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to say one word in reply to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from Indiana will give way, I will move an executive session. I really believe that the treaties with the Indians ought to be considered by the Senate before we come to a definite action upon the bill. As it is for a road right through the Indian Territory, I think that the sense of the Senate, at least on some one or more of these treaties, ought to be taken before this legislation is perfected.

Mr. POMEROY. There is nothing in the treaty, as I understand, conflicting with this bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not feel at liberty to state what is in the treaty until it has been acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I understood there was nothing in conflict with the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection to yielding to the motion, but I do not want to delay the consideration of this bill. I feel bound to favor its consideration at as early an hour as possible; but I am willing that the sense of the Senate may be expressed on the motion.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senate will vote on this bill and dispose of it. We have had it up for three successive days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 11, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the call of committees for reports to go upon the Calendar, not to be brought back into the House by a motion to reconsider.

The call was completed, but no reports were made.

The SPEAKER proceeded as the next business in order to call the States and Territories for resolutions.

PAY OF READING AND TALLY CLERKS.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, offered the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That until further ordered the pay of the reading clerk, the assistant reader, and the tally clerk be made equal to that of the Journal clerk, to commence with the present fiscal year.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would ask the gentleman why he cannot fix the amount of salary. I have always objected to this indefinite mode of fixing salaries.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The resolution only puts these officers on an equality with the Journal clerk. I want the pay made equal. That is all.

The main question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REBEL INVASION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. COFFROTH offered the following preamble and resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas during the late civil war the sixteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania was invaded by the entire rebel army under General Lee, and which remained in said district about three weeks, and to repel and drive out the rebel forces the Army of the United States under the victorious General Meade was marched into said district, encamped and remained there during the great battle of Gettysburg, and the pursuit of the rebel army from the State of Pennsylvania; and whereas the said district was once before thus invaded by General Stuart's rebel army, and once afterward by General McCausland's rebel army; that during these invasions the personal property of the citizens of said district was taken and carried away, and their houses burned and other property destroyed: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee of Claims be, and is hereby, instructed to report a bill to authorize the appointment of commissioners, with such restrictions as the committee deem proper, to ascertain what damages the citizens of said district have suffered, with a view to enforce legislation for the payment of the damages sustained.

Mr. WARD. I ask the gentleman to make that a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. COFFROTH. I meant it as a resolution of reference.

Mr. DELANO. I move to lay the resolution upon the table. This whole subject is before the Committee of Claims, and I think they understand it.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 37, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. DELANO. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DELANO and COFFROTH were appointed.

Mr. DELANO. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. COFFROTH. I modify the resolution so as to read:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of appointing commissioners, &c.

I demand the previous question on the resolution as modified.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 22, noes 70.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GRINNELL. I rise to debate the resolution.

Debate arising, the resolution went over under the rule.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

An act (S. No. 140) to grant the right of way to the Humboldt Canal Company through the public lands of the United States;

An act (S. No. 173) to confirm the title of José Serafín Ramirez to certain lands in New Mexico;

An act (S. No. 180) to confirm the grant of certain lands to José Dominguez in California;

An act (S. No. 261) for the relief of Mrs. Anna G. Gaston; and

An act (S. No. 321) for the relief of Maria Syphax.

EXPLOSION AT WASHINGTON ARSENAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the commandant of the Washington arsenal, transmitting, in lieu of the report heretofore made, a detailed report of the distribution of the money appropriated by Congress to the sufferers of the late explosion in the said arsenal, with the vouchers therefor; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

NEUTRALITY—THE FENIANS.

Mr. ANCONA submitted the following preamble and resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Whereas the Irish people and their brothers and friends in this country are moved by a patriotic purpose to assert the independence and reestablish the nationality of Ireland; and whereas the active sympathies of the people of the United States are naturally with all men who struggle to achieve such ends, more especially when those engaged therein are the acknowledged friends of our Government, as are the Irish race, they having shed their blood in defense of our flag in every battle of every war in which the Republic has been engaged; and whereas the British Government, against whom they are struggling, is entitled to no other or greater consideration from us as a nation than that demanded by the strict letter of international law, for the reason that during our late civil war she did in effect, by her conduct, repeal her neutrality laws; and whereas when reparation is demanded for damages to our commerce, resulting from her willful neglect to enforce the same, she arrogantly denies all responsibility and claims to be the judge in her own case; and whereas the existence of our neutrality law of 1818 compels the executive department of this Government to discriminate most harshly against those who have ever been and are now our friends, and in favor of those who have been faithless, not only to the general principles of comity which should exist between friendly States, but also to the written law of their own nation upon this subject: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to report a bill repealing an act approved April 20, 1818, entitled "An act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," and to repeal the act therein mentioned, it being the neutrality law, under the terms of which the President's proclamation against the Fenians was issued.

The question was upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to lay the preamble and resolution on the table.

Mr. HALE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. Davis] will withdraw his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. DAVIS. I will withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. HALE. I renew the motion.

Mr. ROGERS. I call for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ANCONA. Is debate on this resolution in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is not, except by unanimous consent; for there are two undebatable motions pending, the call for the previous question and the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ANCONA. Then I object to any debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the Chair if it will be in order to move to refer this resolution and preamble to the Committee on Foreign Affairs should the motion to lay on the table be voted down and the call for the previous question be refused.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer would then be in order.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, have I not the floor?

The SPEAKER. No gentleman can obtain the floor now but upon a point of order or to submit a motion in order.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to submit a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ANCONA.]

Mr. ANCONA. I cannot receive any suggestion during the pendency of a motion from the other side to lay this motion on the table. After that motion shall have been voted down I will receive any suggestion and be willing to consent to any reasonable modification of the resolution; but for the present I object to any debate.

The question recurred upon the motion to lay the preamble and resolution on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 5, nays 112, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cobb, Davis, Grinnell, Hale, and Trowbridge—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coffroth, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Deftrees, Delano, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hogan, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Ketchum, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McCullough, McKuer, Meurer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Seaford, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—112.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Baldwin, Barker, Benjamin, Blaine, Blow, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Conkling, Culver, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Eggleson, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hill, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Dennis Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Le Blond, Loan, Marshall, Marston, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Morrill, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Radford, Rollins, Rousseau, Shunklin, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Windom, and Woodbridge—66.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll;

Mr. BROOMALL said: I desire to state that I am paired generally with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. SHANKLIN, and therefore I do not vote on this question.

Mr. GRINNELL said: Mr. Speaker, considering this resolution a reproof of the Administration, I vote "ay" on this motion to lay on the table.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. ANCONA. As there appears to be some objection to the form of this resolution, I withdraw the call for the previous question, and modify the resolution by striking out after the words "instructed to" the word "report," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "inquire into the expediency of reporting;" so that the resolution will read:

That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill repealing, &c.

I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will not the House still have to vote upon the preamble of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The vote on that must be taken separately.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to state, then, that I desire, if the previous question be not seconded, to make a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COBB. I desire to inquire whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania has the right to modify his resolution at this stage without unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. He has, having for that purpose withdrawn the call for the previous question.

Mr. COBB. Well, I object, whether the objection amounts to anything or not.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to permit me to have read, at least, a substitute which I propose to offer for the resolution. Let it be read for information.

Mr. ANCONA. I prefer not to have an amendment offered at this stage. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 27, noes 75.

Mr. ANCONA. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ANCONA and BANKS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes 69.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I demand the previous question upon the resolution and the substitute:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, in the opinion of this House, should reconsider the policy which has been adopted by him as between the British Government and that portion of the Irish people who, under the name of Fenians, are struggling for their independent nationality; and that he be requested to adopt as nearly as practicable that exact course of procedure which was pursued by the Government of Great Britain on the occasion of the late civil war in this country between the United States and rebels in revolt, recognizing both parties as lawful belligerents, and observing between them a strict neutrality.

Mr. ANCONA. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to amend the resolution at this stage?

The SPEAKER. It is. The resolution is now before the House for action. The previous question not having been seconded, the floor passes to some gentleman who opposed the seconding of the previous question. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] having given notice of his intention to move to amend the resolution, has been recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to let a substitute I desire to offer be read for the information of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield for that purpose. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs, if they deem it expedient, report that this House does heartily sympathize with all true Irishmen in their holy struggles for freedom and to relieve their country from the crushing thralldom of Great Britain. That we remember with gratitude that many brave Irishmen periled their lives and mingled their blood with the patriots of the Union Army on many hard-fought fields against rebels, recognized as belligerents and aided by England with ships and money and materials of war, in the wicked purpose to destroy this Government. That in the light of the late precedent established by Great Britain, this nation may, and should, at the earliest practicable proper moment, recognize as a belligerent the Irish nation, and extend to them all the aid and privileges which the laws of nations (modified by the conduct of Great Britain in our late civil war) will permit. And that while this Government refuses to aid freedom upon this continent, in Chili and Mexico, from foreign intervention, to which it stands pledged by solemn instructions of our policy and people, it is ignominious and disgraceful to put forth its power with zeal and alacrity to aid an oppressor to an extent not imperatively required by the observed laws of nations. And that said committee, if they deem it expedient, make report at any time to this House by leave.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw the demand for the previous question for the purpose of explaining to the gentleman from Illinois why I cannot yield to allow his amendment to be offered. I am not for expressing an opinion on either side, but for standing off and looking on as at a fair fight. "Hands off," is the motto I would prefer. I therefore adhere to my own resolution.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to debate unless it is accorded to both sides.

Mr. BANKS. I only wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. ANCONA. I object to debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ANCONA. Is it in order to debate this resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not. If the resolution gives rise to debate it must go over.

Mr. BANKS. I do not wish to debate the resolution. I only wish to say if the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs we will report on it. I move that the resolution and amendment be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—yeas eighty-six, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I move that the resolution and substitute be laid upon the table.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 8, nays 113, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cobb, Davis, Dawes, Dodge, Griswold, Hale, Sloan, and Trowbridge—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cullom, Callom, Darling, Defrees, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Lathin, Latham, William Lawrence, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McCullough, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spaulding, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Upson, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—113.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Barker, Benjamin, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Bundy, Conkling, Cook, Culver, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Eggleston, Goodyear, Grider, Grinnell, Harris, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, McIndoe, McKee, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rollins, Shanklin, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, Van Aernan, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, and Wentworth—62.

So the House refused to lay the amendment and substitute upon the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ANCONA stated that his colleague, Mr. DENISON, was absent, being paired with Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts.

The result having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred on ordering the main question on the motion to refer.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ANCONA] allow me to offer a substitute?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand the yeas and nays on the question of reference, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. BANKS and ANCONA.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas twenty-eight, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on referring the resolution and substitute to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 35, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Grinnell, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Holmes, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jenckes, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kuykendall, Lathin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Ward, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Chandler, Coffroth, Darling, Davis, Dumont, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Ketcham, McCullough, Niblack, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Winfield, and Wright—35.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Barker, Benjamin, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Conkling, Culver, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Goodyear, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelso, Le Blond, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, McIndoe, Moorhead, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Radford, Rollins, Shanklin, Starr, Stevens, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Van Aernan, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Wentworth—61.

So the resolution and substitute were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution and substitute were so referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 255) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending June 30, 1867; when the Speaker signed the same.

AUSTRIAN SOLDIERS IN MEXICO.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if in his opinion this may be done compatibly with the public interest, any information which he may have received with reference to the dispatch of military forces from Austria for service in Mexico.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent of the House for a moment for a personal explanation. While the resolution was pending this morning in regard to the neutrality laws, I made an effort to offer a substitute which it struck me would be received by the House in the nature of a compromise. I ask leave to have my proposed substitute and compromise read.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Speaker, is this a personal explanation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes it is; the gentleman so regards it himself.

The Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

Resolved, That the honor and good faith of the United States imperatively demand a just and rigorous enforcement of the neutrality laws, and that this House will entertain no proposition looking to their repeal, evasion, or violation.

Mr. ANCONA. I move to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House. The gentleman is making a personal explanation.

HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. BROOMALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill amendatory of an act to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved May 11, 1866; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOSPITAL FOR SOLDIERS.

INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. RAYMOND. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which joint resolution of the Senate No. 69, making an appropriation to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes was postponed until to-day. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution was read a third time on Wednesday last, and the question now is on its passage.

Mr. RAYMOND. I wish to state as briefly as possible the reasons which render it important to pass this resolution. It is a resolution which comes from the Senate appropriating the sum of $120,000 for the purpose of enabling the President of the United States to conclude treaties with certain Indian tribes on the northern Missouri and Platte rivers.

The House is aware that growing out of the massacre in Minnesota there ensued a war with some of the Indian tribes. In March, 1865, Congress passed a bill appropriating $20,000 toward the conclusion of treaties of peace with the Indians engaged in those hostilities.

Soon after the passage of that bill the Governor of Dakota Territory made application to the Department of the Interior for prompt action under that law, asking that a commission might be appointed to proceed as speedily as possible to the region of country concerned and conclude treaties with the Indians there.

Some correspondence, I believe, ensued between the War Department and the Department of the Interior as to which properly had charge of the subject, but it all ended in the appointment by the President of a commission, consisting of Governor Edmunds, Major General Curtis, Superintendent Taylor, General Sibley, and Hon. Orrin Guernsey. They were appointed to treat with the Indians and conclude treaties of peace if they found it practicable.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs authorized the purchase of certain goods to be distributed to these Indians. A portion of those purchases were made or authorized to be made by Mr. Burleigh, then the Indian agent there, in New York and St. Louis, and a balance of about eight thousand dollars was placed at the disposal of the commission. The commission proceeded to Fort Sully, and remained there for some time, holding conferences with various Indian tribes who were able to get there at that time.

About October they made a report of the result of their visit which will be found on page 537 of the Report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The general result was that they found a great desire among the Indian tribes for peace. There was only one exception, the Sioux of the Missouri. But they concluded treaties with nine separate tribes, a portion of them being fully represented, and two or three others represented only in part.

They recommended that the commission should be divided and authorized to proceed during this present season to the upper Missouri and the Platte rivers, to complete the work they had commenced and partially completed. They found the Indians with whom they did not make treaties quite willing to remain at peace with the United States; and they were willing to protect the right of way both for the telegraph and the overland mail, but they found them entirely averse to entering into stipulations for their own removal from the territory they occupied. They, therefore, did not press that point.

The commission was accordingly divided and proceeded early in the present season to meet a portion of these Indians on the upper Missouri and the remainder at Fort Laramie, on the Platte river. The commission is now engaged in these negotiations. It is believed by the department that the use of this money by the commission and by the agencies will restore peace to the whole western portion of our country. We all know how expensive Indian wars are, and how unsatisfactory. The object of this appropriation is to enable the commission to go forward to the conclusion of the treaties.

I have before me letters from Governor Edmunds of Dakota Territory strongly recommending the prosecution of these negotiations, together with letters from General Curtis, Superintendent Taylor and others, on the same subject. I have also a detailed statement made out by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the particular sums which are wanted, and the particular objects for which those sums are to be expended. This subject has been examined by the Committee on Appropriations, and they recommend to this House a concurrence with the Senate in this joint resolution.

These are the leading facts of the case. I do not suppose there is any desire to have this subject debated any further, and if not I will call the previous question.

Mr. HALE. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] if we are to understand that the Committee on Appropriations sanction and desire to see carried into effect the provisions of these treaties with these Indians.

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not suppose the Committee on Appropriations have anything to do with that subject. That is a subject for the consideration of the Senate when the treaties come before that body for ratification. These treaties have now been ratified, and are now binding upon these Indians. The only question now is as to the propriety of making an appropriation for the purpose of carrying forward negotiations to perfect treaties where they need perfecting, and at any rate concluding negotiations at that subject.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. RAYMOND. Certainly.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] to say that these bands of Indians were fully represented at the time these treaties were made. Now, I hold in my hand a copy of these treaties, which purport to have been made in the fall of 1865 between the commissioners on the part of the United States and these Indian bands. And I find that the Ogalala band of Indians, numbering some twenty-one hundred souls, were represented only by three irresponsible individuals who were present and claimed to be empowered to conclude negotiations on the part of their tribes. And these commissioners sent down that instrument, made under such circumstances, as a treaty negotiated in good faith to be ratified by the Senate.

Now, I know, and my constituents know, that these Indians, long after these treaties profess to have been signed, have been engaged in robbery and in murder of the citizens of Dakota. Now, when instruments of this character are sent here and styled treaties, and appropriations are asked to carry their provisions into effect and to make others like them, I ask the House to examine them and see what they are. Now, I ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] who I know is a good lawyer, to tell me what a treaty is.

There are three or four articles in these treaties which I will not enumerate. But this treaty which purports to have been made with the Ogalala band, but which was only made with three irresponsible individuals of the tribe, does not profess to have acquired a single acre of land or a single right of any kind but the simple right of way. In that treaty I find an article which I believe is contained in all these treaties. After going on to bind these Indians in certain respects, it provides as follows:

"ART. 6. Any amendment or modification of this treaty by the Senate of the United States shall be considered final and binding upon the said band represented in council as a part of this treaty, in the same manner as if it had been subsequently presented and agreed to by the chiefs and head-men of said band."

Now, I undertake to say that no such article has ever before been placed in any such treaty and sent here for ratification by the Senate. And while I am as anxious as any man can be to secure peace on our frontiers, I protest most solemnly against any such sham treaties as these, for they will not bring peace to our borders or protection to the lives and property of our people. And if these men have been sent up there for any such purpose, and have already expended any part of this money for this purpose, I think it is high time they should be recalled, and that this money should be withheld until we can negotiate treaties which will accomplish the results we so much desire. I desire to have treaties made; but I do not want sham negotiations of this kind.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, the Delegate from Dakota has made two points in reference to this matter. One is that the treaties concluded are not good treaties. The other is that a portion of the tribes said to have been represented in the negotiation of these treaties were only partially represented. Now, sir, as to the first point, I submit that we have nothing to do with it. That question was considered by the Senate when these treaties were before that body for ratification. The Senate has ratified those treaties, after a full examination of the case, and after having heard, I believe, from the gentleman from Dakota the objections which he had to make to those treaties. That closes that matter.

It may be, sir, that the character of the treaties concluded with the Indians by our Government is not what it should be. I have myself great doubts as to the whole policy of our dealing with the Indian tribes. I think that it might be very much reformed, that it might be improved in many respects. But this is not the time to consider that question; nor is it worth our while to postpone an appropriation of this sort in the hope that we may at some time or other get a better general system of dealing with the Indians. If these treaties are not concluded now the war must go on, involving an expenditure of five or six million dollars annually.

Now, sir, in regard to the representation of these tribes in the conference held at Fort Sully, I stated in my previous remarks that of these nine tribes a portion were fully represented and a portion partially represented.

Mr. BURLEIGH. How fully?

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not know how fully. I do not know what a full representation of an Indian tribe is. But I will read what the commissioners say upon this very point. They first state the provisions of the treaty:

"A treaty was finally signed on the 10th October, in which the band recognized the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States; obligated themselves to cease all hostilities, not only against our Government and people, but against other bands or tribes of Indians; to use their influence, and, if requisite, physical force, to prevent other bands from molesting the persons and property of the whites; to withdraw from all overland routes established or to be hereafter established through their country; and not to perpetrate or permit any injuries to travelers thereon."

The commissioners then say:

"Treaties incorporating like provisions, and, when practicable, articles for the aid and encouragement of individuals or portions of the bands, or of the bands themselves, in locating them upon reservations and engaging them in agricultural or other kindred labor, were subsequently concluded with the Lower Brules, Two Kettles, and Blackfeet, all important branches of the Teton Sioux, numbering in the aggregate six hundred lodges, or thirty-six hundred souls, fully represented."

This is the language of the commissioners. They continue:

"With the Lower Yanktonais, who inhabit the great prairies east of the Missouri, and who claim two hundred and seventy lodges, or sixteen hundred souls, (leaving out one hundred lodges not represented in council,) and with portions of the Etah-ye-cho or Sans Arcs, the Unepapas, and the Ogalalas, only partially represented by chiefs and head-men. The great majority of the last-mentioned subdivisions, and many of the warriors of the other bands treated with, have been among those most hostile to the whites."

This is what was done at Fort Sully. Here is what, according to the commission, is needed to be done this summer:

"There still remain to be reached, of the Dakotas or Sioux, one or two entire bands, and such parts of others as did not make their appearance in council by their immediate representatives. The messages sent to them, and also to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, through various sources, by the commissioners, will prepare them for such future propositions as you may see fit to authorize. The undersigned respectfully recommend a division of the present or the appointment of two new commissions to visit the Fort Laramie region and the upper Missouri simultaneously, as early in the coming spring as practicable. It will be physically impossible for a single commission, in the same season, to visit and treat with the many bands and tribes embraced in your programme of instructions, and to secure the overland route and that by the Missouri river from annoyance by Indians. Negotiations should be commenced with the savages infesting these great highways without unavoidable delay. The commission should be en route to their respective fields of operation not later than the month of May next."

The very object of this new commission, or rather this new mission, is to complete what was left unfinished, to secure a full representation of such tribes as were then partially represented. The object of this commission is to complete the work which the gentleman from Dakota says is now uncompleted, and therefore ought not to be completed, according to his argument. Now, sir, this is the whole object of the commission. I do not see any ground, any substantial reason in anything that the gentleman from Dakota has said, why this appropriation should not now be made.

The gentleman from Iowa desires to make some remarks, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The gentleman says that the Indians were fully represented and the treaties were completed. I ask whether the treaties sent into the Senate, and which have been confirmed, were not those made when the Indians were not fully represented and which of course are not complete.

Mr. RAYMOND. I refer the gentleman to the Senate on that point. They are not before the House in any shape.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I was present when most of the treaties referred to were made, and it is therefore, perhaps, proper I should say something in regard to them. I can say from my own personal knowledge that the charges made by the gentleman from Dakota against the commissioners as well as against those treaties are without foundation.

I only qualify my statement, that so far as the treaty with the Ogalalas is concerned, I perhaps was not present when it was signed. With that exception, and one or two others, I was present at the time negotiations were entered upon and at the time they were concluded; and I can say from my own personal knowledge that those Indian bands were fully and properly represented in these negotiations. When I say they were fully and properly represented, I mean to say they were represented by their chiefs, head men, and head soldiers. They were represented by the representative men of the different bands with whom treaties were made.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, let me make a single remark in reference to those who composed that commission. I will say you may search the country through and you will not find four more honorable men or better qualified to discharge the duties assigned to them than were these commissioners. General Sibley, of Minnesota, once occupied a seat in this House, afterward was Governor of that State, and during the late war held the commission of a brigadier general; a man of large influence with the Indians. Indeed, no man in the northwest country has had more experience with Indians than General Sibley. He thoroughly understands and comprehends their character.

Major General Curtis was one of the commissioners. He was twice elected from my own State as a member of this House, and he took a distinguished and important part in the great struggle through which we have passed. He is a gentleman of large intelligence and capacity.

I may make the same remarks of the other members of the commission. They were all men of intelligence. In the discharge of their duties they acted for the best interests of the Government as well as for the best interests of the Indians themselves. In making those treaties they supposed they were acting for the best interests of the United States as well as of the Indians. The charges of the gentleman from Dakota are, therefore, gratuitous.

Those treaties were submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, the President of the United States, and to the Senate by whom they were confirmed. In the Senate they were met by a written argument against them. The Committee on Indian Affairs of that body fully investigated these charges and declared them to be groundless; that they were without any foundation in truth; and the result has been the confirmation of all those treaties. After all that has occurred in this matter it becomes the Delegate from Dakota to offer further opposition.

So far as the appropriation is concerned that is now asked for by this joint resolution I need make no remarks, as the matter has been fully and satisfactorily explained by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND.] I know the Arapaho and Cheyennes were to be treated with on the upper Platte, the Indians most foremost in committing depredations on the emigrants on the overland route. They are now assembling in large numbers, expecting to meet the commissioners and conclude a treaty of peace and friendship which shall be lasting between them and the Government.

So far as the Indians on the upper Missouri are concerned they were included under the Fort Laramie treaty. I refer to the Crows, the Mandans, Assinibouines, Aricarees, Gros Ventres, and Blackfeet Indians. They have received presents and annuities under that treaty, but it has expired by its own limitations. We have no treaty with them at this time; they are assembled at points on the Missouri for the purpose of meeting your commissioners and concluding treaties with them. Fail to meet them and carry out this arrangement and you have war on the frontier; the settlements that are represented here by the gentleman from Dakota will be overrun by hostile savages, and you will have murders and depredations committed, and perhaps a new military expedition will be required against these hostile bands.

There is but one way, in my judgment, to secure peace on that frontier, and that is by negotiating treaties of peace and friendship. They have been encouraged to assemble at these points, expecting to meet these commissioners. They are there now, and the commissioners, as I understand, are on the way for the purpose of conferring with them generally.

Without continuing these remarks, I think it is of the highest importance that we should pass this appropriation, and give to the President and the Department the means with which to carry out these negotiations and conclude these treaties.

Mr. RAYMOND resumed the floor.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment or two?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURLEIGH. It was with the greatest reluctance that I undertook to question the propriety of this bill, or to raise my voice against it in the presence of so many able men in opposition to a measure which I deem so entirely at war with the best interests of the Territory which I have the honor to represent. I was aware that I was to be brought in contact with able men and statesmen, well versed in legislation and in logic. But I will say that there is one thing that my friend's logic cannot do. It cannot change error to truth any more than it can change truth to error. I hold in my hand these treaties for the completion of which this appropriation is asked. I ask if they were not completed, signed, and witnessed before they were sent to the Senate for ratification. If they were, what necessity is there for a further appropriation to complete them? If they were not completed, perfect, valid treaties in law and in fact, why, I ask, were they ratified.

I am as much in favor of peace with the Indian tribes in Dakota as any man can be; my interests are all there; our people are anxious for peace. But I ask the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] to tell me what a treaty is. Will he pretend to state to this House that these nine instruments of writing which I hold in my hand are treaties? If the Senate has a right to modify or amend these treaties without the consent of the Indian tribes, who are parties to these negotiations, which are made for the avowed purpose of securing peace with those tribes, what occasion is there for sending commissioners at all to negotiate them? Why not make them here, and avoid the expense of the negotiation? Why deplete the Treasury for such a needless undertaking?

Mr. Speaker, I feel confident that this House does not fully understand the importance of this question. It is one of vital interest to those of our people who reside upon the frontiers; and I suggest for the consideration of the House whether it would not be better for the Government to adopt a new system of treaty-making with our Indian tribes, and show them and the world that it will act justly with them, regardless of cost or consequences.

The gentleman states that these tribes were fully represented. What does he mean? Does he pretend to say that the Ogalalas, a tribe numbering twenty-one hundred souls, were fully represented, when it appears from the treaties themselves that there were but three members of that band present when they were made and signed? Does he pretend to say the Unepapas, numbering as they do twenty-seven hundred souls, were fully represented, when it appears from the record which I hold in my hand that there were but fourteen members of that tribe present? The truth is, these tribes were not fully represented; and if my information is correct, the great majority of them will not recognize these transactions as binding. They may keep the peace until they receive what goods and presents the Government has sent them this spring; but I greatly fear that all of their provisions will then be disregarded by the Indians.

I have recently seen General Connor, who has been in the country occupied by these tribes, and he assures me that nearly all of the Indians belonging to the Sioux nation are bitterly opposed to any treaty of peace with the Government whatever, and that these negotiations will prove a failure.

Mr. RAYMOND. The gentleman from Dakota has done nothing more than his duty in presenting to the House such considerations why this joint resolution should not pass as he has presented.

I have already answered the objection he has made, that these tribes were not fully represented. I do not think any tribe is ever present in full when a treaty is made.

As to the character of the treaty, I have no desire to discuss that; but the gentleman is mistaken in saying that the provision to which he refers, by which the Senate can alter the treaty, is put in a treaty for the first time. The same provision was in the treaty of 1861, and this power was exercised by the Senate.

Now, I wish to mention another fact in connection with this resolution, and it is this: last fall, when this commission found itself under the necessity of closing their labors on account of the lateness of the season and the impossibility of getting the other tribes properly represented, it was agreed that there should be another meeting as early as possible during the present season. It was indispensably necessary that provisions should be taken there to supply these Indians whenever they gathered there. Now, gentlemen from that part of the country say that it was absolutely necessary to take advantage of the high waters of the early season to get the provisions there. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary, anticipating that this appropriation would be made, that quite a large amount of money should be spent in advance, taking funds from other branches of the Department of the Interior under the authority of the Secretary.

In view of the emergency which pressed upon them, the question would have been brought before Congress at an earlier day but for the fact that a misunderstanding existed whether the expenses were to be met by the War Department or by the Department of the Interior. General Curtis, who conducted, I believe, the greater part of the negotiations, understood the Secretary of War to say, and, indeed, he received a communication from the War Department which assured him, that provisions would at once be sent forward and be on hand when the commission should assemble; but afterward it was ascertained that the Secretary of War, at a subsequent interview with the Secretary of the Interior, informed him that the War Department could not undertake to supply the provisions. The Secretary of the Interior did not understand this, but afterward he did so; and as soon as he ascertained that fact he appealed to Congress for this appropriation on the 18th of April. The letter was sent to the Senate, and the chairman of its Committee on Finance, who is familiar with all Indian affairs, took it in hand and gave the Secretary to understand that he would be quite safe in going forward furnishing supplies to these Indians, inasmuch as there could be no grounds of opposition to this appropriation.

I mention this fact to explain the circumstance that a portion of this money has already been expended, being drawn from another fund under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, which will not be wanted until about the 1st of July. If this appropriation be made now, that sum will be in his hands on the 1st of July.

I now move the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. RAYMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider do lie on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISCHARGED OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

Mr. KERR, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to prevent the further enforcement of joint resolution No. 77, approved July 4, 1864, against officers and soldiers of the United States who have been honorably discharged; which were read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INSANE SOLDIERS.

Mr. KERR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to, namely:

Whereas under existing laws, and the official construction of the same, a soldier who has been honorably discharged, and has thereafter become insane, from causes arising out of and produced by his service in the Army, cannot gain admission to any hospital for the insane; and whereas manifest hardship and injustice are thus sometimes inflicted upon such persons: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report a bill or joint resolution so amending the existing law as to remedy the wrong aforesaid.

Mr. KERR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT TO AND REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill for the regulation of appointments to and removals from office; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

TRIAL OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Mr. BOUTWELL asked unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is notorious that Jefferson Davis was the leader of the late rebellion, and is guilty of treason under the laws of the United States; and whereas by the proclamation of the President of May, 1865, the said Davis was charged with complicity in the assassination of President Lincoln, and said proclamation has not been revoked nor annulled: Therefore,

Be it resolved, As the opinion of the House of Representatives, that said Davis should be held in custody as a prisoner, and subjected to a trial according to the laws of the land.

Mr. ROGERS. I object to the introduction of this resolution.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling me to submit the preamble and resolution which have just been read.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 68, noes 10; no quorum voting.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to ask if there is any pretense that Mr. Davis had any connection with the assassination—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object to any debate.

Mr. ROGERS. The contrary is the fact. I assert—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] is not in order.

Mr. ROGERS. The proof is that he had nothing—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] must refrain from making remarks out of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to ask the Chair if remarks made upon this floor which are out of order, and so decided to be, are to be printed in the Globe?

The SPEAKER. They will be, if reported. The last Congress adopted a resolution forbidding the Globe reporters from reporting what was said out of order; but this Congress has adopted no such resolution.

The question recurred upon ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 20, not voting 66; as follows:

Mr. BOUTWELL. I call for the previous question on the preamble and resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot yield.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first taken upon the resolution.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 19, not voting 59; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 37) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending 30th June, 1867;

An act (H. R. No. 459) granting a pension to Anna E. Ward; and

An act (H. R. No. 654) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.

OFFICERS OF STEAMER SUMTER.

Mr. WINDOM. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is a joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) providing pay to officers of the United States steamer Sumter for loss of clothing. The resolution was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND], and was pending at the adjournment on last Friday. It now comes up as the unfinished business.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of Peter Hayes, and others, officers of the United States steamer Sumter, to ascertain the value of all the clothing and effects by them respectively lost at the time of her destruction, and to allow them for the same, to an amount not exceeding $5,000 in the aggregate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker—The SPEAKER. In the absence of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE], being a member of the committee, is recognized as entitled to the floor. The Chair presumes he has charge of the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was not left specially in charge of this bill; but I ask that the report accompanying the bill may be again read.

The report was read.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to establish a new precedent in the adjustment of cases of losses by naval officers. I believe that no bill has ever yet been passed which allowed more than $100 to each officer in such cases. But this bill proposes to allow for all clothing and effects, whatever they may be, an amount which shall not exceed in the aggregate $5,000, which, if I rightly remember the number of names embraced in the bill, will be nearly a thousand dollars to each of the officers. Now, it seems to me that it is not best for us to establish this precedent.

In cases where a vessel has gone down in action, as was the case with several vessels on the Mississippi and on the coast, the allowance, I believe, has, as I have stated, never exceeded $100 to each officer. The amount allowed to seamen, if my recollection is correct, is sixty dollars. The general rule observed in relation to officers of the Navy is, I believe, an allowance of one month's extra pay. But this bill proposes to establish a different rule; and it does seem to me that it may lead to a greater expenditure of money than a just regard for the Treasury of the Government will warrant us in making.

The officers of this vessel may have had with them no property but such as it was their duty to have as officers of the Navy. If so, it might be well to pay them for that property, whatever it may have been. But they may have had with them property which it was not necessary for them to have upon that vessel. Gold watches, jewelry, and various articles of that kind may have been in their possession. Yet such things are not excluded by the terms of this bill. The bill proposes to pay for all "clothing and effects" which those officers had and which were lost by the sinking of that vessel. Now, sir, if any such bill has before been passed by Congress, it has escaped my attention, and I have not been able to find it in the statutes.

I hope, therefore, that this bill, instead of being passed, will either be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, in order that we may know from that committee whether they intend to establish a new precedent, a new line of action on the part of the Government toward these officers, or will be referred to the Committee of Claims, so that, if we are to pay for all the effects of these officers, that committee may determine the amount which ought to be paid to each officer. I shall move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims, unless the gentleman from Wisconsin would prefer that it should be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Although I have not had this matter specially in charge I think the gentleman is mistaken as to the intention of the bill. The committee were unanimously in favor of reporting this bill. The regulations of the Government require these officers to have the amount of clothing mentioned in the report. The intention is to pay for those things they were required to have, and not to pay for gold watches, or money, or anything of that kind.

Mr. BROMWELL. With the gentleman's permission, I ask whether the men on board this ship lost anything, and whether the bill proposes to provide anything for them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The men are provided for by general law, while the officers are not provided for at all. If there is any justice in paying the men as we have provided for paying them by general law, certainly there is justice in paying officers for the loss of property they were required by the regulations to have.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The language of the proposition does not confine the payment to those things they were required to have. It provides for the payment of all the clothing and other effects belonging to those persons lost on that occasion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If that be in the bill I will agree to add that they shall only be paid for the clothing and other effects they were required under the regulations to have. There is no intention to go beyond that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to enter a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, so that we may have a uniform rule established in cases of this kind. As I have already said, this goes beyond anything Congress has done heretofore.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have no objection to the bill being recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

On motion of Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 282, to reorganize the clerical force of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WAR OF 1812.

Mr. COFFROTH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and those engaged in the Indian wars during that period; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed House bill No. 62, to regulate and secure the safe-keeping of public money intrusted to disbursing officers of the United States.

DRAFT.

Mr. ANCONA, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House what number of persons, together with their names, were drawn in the draft commenced February, 1865, in the eighth congressional district of Pennsylvania, under call of December 19, 1864, and held to service, who had previously been drafted and paid commutation or furnished substitutes, under section seventeen of act of February 24, 1864, within the year and under prior calls of 1864.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. KELLEY gave notice of his intention to offer the following as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee on reconstruction for restoring the States lately in insurrection to their full political rights; which was ordered to be printed:

Whereas the eleven States which lately formed the so-called confederate States of America are without their practical relations to the Union, and cannot be fully restored or reinstated in the same without action of Congress: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the eleven States lately in rebellion may form valid State governments in the following manner:

SEC. 2. The State governments now existing, though formed in the midst of martial law, and though, in many instances, their constitutions were adopted under duress, and not submitted to the people for ratification, are hereby acknowledged as valid governments for municipal purposes.

SEC. 3. The President shall direct the Governors of the said eleven States which lately formed the so-called confederate States of America, to call conventions on or before the 1st day of January, 1867, for the formation of State constitutions. And to enable the electoral people of the several States aforesaid to choose delegates to the said conventions, the Governor or chief executive officer of each of said States shall order an election to be held on a day to be fixed by him for members of a convention to frame a constitution for said State, which said constitution shall be submitted to a vote of the people of said States in accordance with the provisions hereinafter contained, and if ratified by a majority of the legal voters as hereinafter described, shall be declared to be the constitution of said State.

SEC. 4. The persons who shall be entitled to vote at said elections shall be all persons irrespective of color who shall have resided in the State six months prior to said election, are twenty-one years of age, and can read the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 5. No constitution from any of said States shall be presented to or acted on by Congress which shall deny to any person, irrespective of color or previous condition, equal liberty and rights before the law, including the right of suffrage, as hereinbefore limited.

SEC. 6. Whenever the foregoing conditions shall have been complied with, and the amendments to the Constitution adopted by Congress since the rebellion of the people of the States aforesaid, shall have been ratified by any of said States, the representatives of such State may present its constitution to Congress, and if the same shall be approved by Congress, said State shall be declared entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities and be subject to all the obligations and liabilities of a State within the Union, and thereupon a general amnesty shall be declared by the President to all who have offended against the authority, dignity, and peace of the United States in the recent rebellion.

AMBROSE MORRISON.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce from the Committee of Claims a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase certain property for military purposes, and to have it considered and acted upon now.

The bill was read. It proposes to pay the sum of $15,000 as compensation for the destruction of the dwelling-house of Ambrose Morrison, and the use of the lot and part of the materials of the house for a fort by order of General J. D. Morgan, on the 4th day of May, 1863.

Mr. McKEE. I object to the consideration of the bill. I am willing to have it recommitted.

Mr. SLOAN. Then I move to recommit it to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAWS OF INSURGENT STATES.

Mr. RAYMOND, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a statement of the provisions of the laws and ordinances of the late insurgent States on the subject of the rebel debt, so called.

PAY OF CLERK TO THE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. KERR, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the compensation of Moses Dillon, clerk to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, be, and the same is hereby, increased and made the same as that of the Journal clerk of this House, beginning with the 1st of June, 1866.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to limit the time for bringing suits before the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POST OFFICES AND INTERNAL REVENUE OFFICES.

Mr. JOHNSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the erection of a fire-proof building in the principal city or town of each congressional district, to be used for the purpose of a post office and offices for the assessors and collectors of the proper district, where the records which may involve titles to land, &c., may be kept always secure.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to prevent officers of the Navy from being deprived of their regular promotion on account of wounds received in battle; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLAINE asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing a rule for speeches of fifteen minutes in addition to the rule for speeches of one hour; and that in all cases a member proposing to speak fifteen minutes shall be entitled to the floor to the exclusion of one proposing to speak an hour; and that hereafter no proposition shall be entertained for extending the time of any member under either rule.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL SCOTT.

Mr. SITGREAVES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of one member from each State represented in this House be appointed on the part of this House, to join such a committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to consider and report on the propriety of an address before the Congress of the United States commemorative of the life, character, and services of the late Brevet Lieutenant General Winfield Scott.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, upon which Mr. ROUSSEAU was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Mr. Speaker, it matters very little to me what may be the intrinsic merits of these measures proposed for our adoption if they in fact are an impediment to the admission of the States lately in insurrection to representation on this floor. Sir, the majority in this House have held and now hold in the palm of their hands the power to restore the Union and give peace and harmony to the country.

And yet after seven months, though during all that time the majority could in half an hour have given the country this peace and harmony, we find ourselves to-day further off than we were at the beginning.

Before Congress met, Mr. Speaker COLFAX laid down the rule by which this Congress should be governed on that subject. From that day to this the radical wing of the Republican party has been departing from the Lincoln-Johnson policy. He came to Washington before Congress assembled and made a speech in which he declared that the Representatives of the States lately in rebellion were not to be recognized upon this floor until Congress should decide to admit them.

That, sir, was the beginning of our trouble, and it has been augmenting from that day to this, and now we are here with the results of the war frittered away and the Union declared dissolved. At the first caucus on the Saturday night preceding the meeting of Congress, acting on the programme of Speaker COLFAX, the radical wing of the Republican party, was quietly prepared for burial. The resolution adopted by that caucus and passed by this House buried that wing of the party so deep that nobody will ever be able to find it. It was in pursuance of the plan announced by Speaker COLFAX that the Union was dissolved by the majority of this House.

A great deal has been said about the failure of the President to call Congress together, and he has been much denounced for not doing so. Why, sir, if Congress had staid away from these Halls, and the nation had had its appropriations made so as to carry on the Government two years, the Union would have restored itself.

I think Mr. Speaker COLFAX himself was the first to make the complaint against the President for not calling Congress together. I propose now to see how just these gentlemen are in regard to their accusations against the President. I have the letter of Mr. COLFAX, published a few days ago, and I desire to call the attention of the House to this matter. It was charged in the newspapers that he had been off on some pleasure trip to the Pacific when he ought to have been here to urge upon the President the necessity of an extra session of Congress if he really believed such a necessity existed. Speaker COLFAX, in reply to that matter, says among other things:

"1. I was not Speaker at all when I made my 'interesting trans-continental journey,' my term having expired with the termination of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, March 4, 1865.

"2. I had some expectation of a reelection when the Thirty-Ninth Congress should convene, and came to Washington on the 14th of April, the morning of the very day President Lincoln was murdered, to consult with him as to an extra session."

Mark you, Mr. COLFAX does not say he came on here with a view to get the President to call Congress together, but he says, "I had some expectation of a reelection when the Thirty-Ninth Congress should convene, and came to Washington." Now, I wish to ask Mr. COLFAX, if it was of so much importance to have Congress convene, he being a leading member and likely to be reelected Speaker, if it would not have been just as well for him to have suggested, ay, and insisted upon the convening of Congress; and if he could not just as well have done that as to have gone off on that pleasant and delightful trip to visit Brigham Young and his wives. Was it not the duty of Mr. COLFAX to remain here and suggest to the President, if it existed, the necessity of calling Congress together? But he did not do it. He does not say in this letter that he was of opinion Congress ought to have met, but states that having some notion of being Speaker of the House, he came on here to look after that matter. And so, when he had seen about that, finding that Congress would not meet, he then made the delightful trip to visit Brigham Young and his wives, and gather the materials for that splendid lecture by which he interested all the men, women, and children of this country.

Now, sir, I object to this as unjust. I say that if Mr. Speaker COLFAX wished President Johnson to call Congress together it was his duty as a leading Union man to have called upon him and asked him to do it. I object to the radical wing of the Union party in this House making that complaint against President Johnson. If they desired President Johnson to call Congress together, then, in good faith, they should have come forward and asked him to do it. I ask, where is the man in this House who ever suggested such a thing to President Johnson? Mr. Speaker COLFAX says that he mentioned it to the President. He called upon him a day or two after the murder of Mr. Lincoln, not a very proper time to discuss such a matter.

But he says he alluded to it; that he asked President Johnson if he intended to call Congress together. The President told him that so suddenly had the responsibilities of the presidential office been thrown upon him that he had not thought upon the matter. And Mr. Speaker COLFAX goes on to say that he did not argue the matter then. That is the first and the last that has been heard of a desire on the part of Mr. Speaker COLFAX or anybody else to have Congress assembled, except what Mr. COLFAX said to Mr. Lincoln. "He did not argue it," no, he expressed no wish even to him that Congress should meet. And when President Johnson told Mr. Speaker COLFAX that the responsibilities of his new position had been so suddenly thrown upon him that he had not thought about it, Mr. Speaker COLFAX did not express any desire about it.

So the only purpose of the Speaker in calling upon the President was to find out when Congress would meet, so that he might be the Speaker of this House; not for the purpose at all of having Congress called together, because he did not ask that it should be done. And when he says in this letter, for Buncombe, that he did not argue that matter with the President, I do not think he gave a fair impression of his wishes in the premises. I do not think the public should be misled by that intimation of Mr. Speaker COLFAX that he desired Congress to meet, when he did not say so, when he did not urge it. He had not expressed the mildest and most modest desire to the President for it; but went off for months to the far West.

Yet the first thing when he came back here was to complain that Congress was not called together. Whose duty was it to urge the assembling of Congress? More than of all others the Union men on this floor should have acted together in that matter, if they really felt that the interests of the country required that Congress should meet.

And a few days ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] made the same complaint. And he also indulged in a great deal of denunciation on that occasion; a denunciation wholly unbecoming a member of this House; a denunciation, I am free to say, that is unworthy to be uttered on this floor. He denounced the President as a demagogue in so many words, and every man who is for his policy as a lick-spittle, a sycophant, a man crouching at the feet of power to obtain office. Now, I say these are unworthy terms to be uttered by one gentleman of another. And so far as I am concerned I hurl them back in the teeth of those who utter them.

Now, I wish to know what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has done to entitle him to so lecture the friends of Andrew Johnson. What has he done, or what have those done who are the bitterest in their denunciations of the President and of his friends? They have staid at home, filled offices, denounced treason, and aided to crush the rebellion in that way. The gentleman from Illinois, if he is remarkable for anything, is remarkable for his physical strength. He is in the prime of manhood, stouter than one in ten thousand, and yet he expends his wrath against the rebels and rebellion in denunciation of those who fought for the Government and who are in favor of the restoration of peace, of harmony, and good will.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not desire to have my train of thought interrupted during this discussion, and I hope no gentleman will—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I merely desired to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the fact that my colleague [Mr. INGERSOLL] is not now in the House.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I am perfectly aware of that, Mr. Speaker; and it is not my fault that he is not here. I was not here when he indulged in that denunciation of Andrew Johnson and his friends. I must take this opportunity to reply to those remarks; and I will say to the gentleman's colleague that, if the gentleman is not here now, I suppose he will be back some day; and I will account to him for whatever I may now say in his absence.

I only wish, Mr. Speaker, to allude in all fairness and courtesy to the course of that gentleman. I shall do it in such terms as seem to me appropriate. If the gentleman were here, I should be glad, because I might then use terms different from those which I employ now. Let me read a part of what the gentleman chose to say on the occasion to which I have referred:

"Sir, let Andrew Johnson remember that the very people who are sustaining him to-day, the very men who are calling upon the country to support the President's policy, are the same men who so vehemently denounced him and hounded him a few months ago. They are the men who were against him and all others who were fighting for the Government during the bloody years of war. None of his old friends support him now, except it may be some parasite, some lick-spittle, who, wants some contemptible office within his gift."

Now, sir, that assertion of the gentleman from Illinois is false, to begin with. It is unjust to the President and his friends; and it is more unjust to the gentleman himself than to anybody concerned. I ask him, sir, who are Grant and Sherman and Thomas? Are not they supporters of the President? And will the gentleman tell them that they are lick-spittles? Who are the hundreds of thousands of honest and loyal men who fought in the war for the Union and who agree with the President? Will the gentleman call them "lick-spittles"? Yes, sir; he denounces them all as lick-spittles, and men who are seeking some contemptible office!

The gentleman did not tell the House what caused all that ebullition of passion and rage. It was the removal of one of his friends from a contemptible office in Peoria; an editor of a newspaper, who was only excelled by the gentleman himself in his abuse of the President and his friends; a man who ought not to have the influence of an office to aid him in his purposes of detraction. That man was removed, and hence all this vile abuse of the President and his friends; hence this unworthy deportment of a member of Congress, assailing, in these times of doubt and distrust, the highest official in the nation. Sir, is that the way in which to restore peace to the country? It is at least the only way in which that gentleman, and others like himself, attempt to do it.

But, sir, as I was remarking, this House, from the beginning of the session, has held restoration in the palm of its hand. A half hour's work would have been sufficient to accomplish it at any moment. If the Lincoln-Johnson policy had been adhered to by this House; if legally elected members from the southern States, loyal as any here, had been admitted upon this floor, restoration would have been accomplished.

But, asks the gentleman from Illinois, what has Andrew Johnson done? I ask you, sir, what has been done in reference to this whole matter that Andrew Johnson has not done? And I ask again, what has been done by him that any man on this floor wishes to have undone? What man dare say that he would repudiate the past action of Andrew Johnson, the steps toward restoration which he has taken? Who would shut up the custom-houses in the South and suspend the collection of customs?

Who would recall the assessors and collectors of taxes in the southern States? Who would close the courts there? Who would recall the postmasters, and suspend the operations of the post offices throughout that portion of the Union? Who would repudiate the President's action in all these respects?

And, sir, what have we done here? Sir, it is said that on a certain occasion Queen Elizabeth, as was the custom of the monarchs of that realm, asked the Speaker of the House of Commons, "What have you passed, sir?" He said, "Seven weeks, your Royal Highness." In like manner you could answer, "Seven months." If we have passed anything else, except a Freedmen's Bureau bill, and a few other such measures, I should like to know what it is.

And yet, sir, this day we might have been at our homes, and the country in the process of healing. We might have had loyal members from southern States who were legally elected on this floor. We might have thus completed the work of Andrew Johnson, and rejoiced in a restored and happy country. Instead of that we have spent all our time in the denunciation of rebels and in provoking sectional strife.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no love for rebels, but that, on the contrary, if I hate anybody I hate those who have brought this trouble upon the nation. I have no excuses to offer for those who were the ringleaders in the commission of this great and terrible crime. I am of the opinion that they should be arrested and tried, and if convicted of treason they should hang for it, if the interest of the country should demand it.

Mr. Speaker, as to rendering some of the classes of persons named in this bill ineligible to hold any Federal office, if it were legally proper, I should not say a word. I believe those who committed this great crime and brought this desolation upon the nation, should suffer for it. I have no hesitation in saying that the nation itself should look to them. But let us punish men according to the laws which fixed the punishment at the time the crime was committed. I would not take the vilest miscreant on the face of the earth, even if I had the power, and punish him against the law. We have had enough of that during the troublous times which, thank God, are passed. I objected to very little that was done by those who administered the Government which was necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. The war, however, is now over, and I think we have had unconstitutional action enough. It seems now we will never get back to the old landmarks; that we will never get back to a constitutional basis, and that men have really forgotten what the Constitution provides for and what it demands.

I said awhile ago, Mr. Speaker, that the Lincoln-Johnson policy had been departed from. I wish to call the attention of the House for one moment to a single instance in which that was done. In 1861 Mr. Maynard, from East Tennessee, was elected to Congress, came to this city, took his seat, and filled out his term. He was elected in August, 1861. He was elected after the ordinance of secession was adopted by Tennessee, after the battle of Bull Run was fought, and in the midst of a mighty war, the end of which no man living could foresee. He came here representing a district in Tennessee, while his colleagues were not able to get here being prevented by the rebels. But we were then told that this war was prosecuted for the preservation of the Union, and for that purpose only. Mr. Maynard after the war is over is again elected to Congress from the same district. He comes to this city to take his seat, but strange to relate is refused admission: Why, sir? I wish any gentleman upon this floor would tell me what difference there is between Mr. Maynard of to-day and Mr. Maynard of 1861. I will yield to any gentleman for an answer. He is the same man. He comes here representing the same constituency. The only difference, sir, is that the war is now over, and we were then in the midst of it.

Taylor comes here. His predecessor elected in that year was also admitted. Stokes comes here. His predecessor was also admitted, not in that year but afterward. He could not get here for the rebels.

Gentlemen say, however, they cannot receive Representatives from isolated districts, but must receive the whole State. Put your finger upon a disloyal man claiming a seat here from that State. Put your finger upon an illegally elected man claiming a seat from that State. Do you know, sir, what their constituency was? I wish to call the attention of the House to that fact.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Not now.

Mr. PRICE. I understood the gentleman to say that he would give time to answer a question.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Yes, if you will answer the question what is the difference between Mr. Maynard of 1861 and Mr. Maynard of to-day.

Mr. PRICE. I will answer you by reading Mr. Stokes's language on the subject.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I ask you in reference to Mr. Maynard, and if you have the answer let us have it.

Mr. PRICE. You referred to Colonel Stokes. I have Colonel Stokes's answer now here.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Yes; but will the gentleman answer me as to Maynard? I will tell you what I know about Colonel Stokes's district. I know that in his district about ten thousand men furnished bayonets to put down the rebellion; as brave men as ever fought a battle or went to heroes' graves. And not only that, but the country was stripped of everything, and the people are now naked and starving. These people send men here to represent them, and yet they cannot be received. Why should you reject Maynard to-day, when you received him as a Representative in 1861? You tell us that we are lickspittles, and that we have deserted the policy of Mr. Lincoln. Have we left the Baltimore platform of 1864? You tell us, who remain true to that platform that you made for us to stand upon, that we are deserters from the Union party. I again ask some gentleman to tell me the difference between the Maynard of 1861 and the Maynard of to-day, and why he is not admitted now. The only answer of your leader is, that a combination might be formed between the copperheads of the North and the rebels of the South, and that the Republican party might lose its power.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about that. If I have had a wish on earth it has been that the Union party of this nation should retain power. I think it has a right to administer the Government that it saved. I deny the right to those who have been trying to break up this Government to come in now and administer it. And let me say that a liberal and generous policy by Congress would have given a supremacy to the Union party North and South which nothing could have broken for thirty years. That party had a prestige that none other ever had; but that prestige is now in danger of being lost. I tell you, sir, that you must come back to the old Union ground, that this war was prosecuted to save the Government, and not to place power in the hands of a few men to destroy it. And you will come back. Even now you dare not adjourn this Congress without admitting the Tennessee members. You radical gentlemen must come back to the old Union doctrine of Lincoln and Johnson. My prediction is, that Speaker COLFAX, who is one of your leaders, will tell you that you must not go back to your constituencies without doing it. You dare not go back and tell your people that you admitted Maynard in 1861 legally, and could not do it now. The record is against you; the facts are against you; and in the admission of these members is involved the whole question between us. It is the Lincoln-Johnson policy to admit them, and the radical policy to reject them.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to say a word?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I dislike to be interrupted. Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire simply to correct the gentleman, and to say that my understanding has been that Speaker COLFAX from the commencement of the session has been in favor of the admission of the loyal members from Tennessee.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. So every gentleman on your side says. You all say that you are in favor of the admission of the loyal men from Tennessee, and are anxious for it. And yet, in spite of your anxiety, seven months have gone by, and I do not see that anything has been done in that direction. Every gentleman in the House says that he is anxious to admit these States at the earliest day possible; but where is the work that you have done toward it? It might be done in thirty minutes. I tell you what it is. When, in 1870, another presidential election shall have passed away, and the majority here shall have secured a new lease of power, then you will let in these men. Your object is not restoration; it is obstruction and procrastination.

Your desire, as was said by a gentleman from Pennsylvania the other day, is to secure the right of the negro to vote in the South so as to counterbalance the votes of the copperheads and rebels. Do any gentlemen suppose they could get the negro vote South? Every master would vote his negro. You would not get them. Sir, I ask this House if it is wise and just and proper to attempt to enforce upon these States such a condition before we will admit members who are legitimately entitled to seats here? And what would this negro vote amount to? The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in his first speech of the session on this floor said that by the operation of the infernal laws of slavery the negroes South were kept in such ignorance that they were unable to understand the plainest terms of the simplest contracts. And a little further on in the same speech, that the right of suffrage should be conferred by Congress upon them; thus placing in the hands of people so ignorant the destinies of a country like this. Such is the radical doctrine.

But what was Mr. Lincoln's policy of restoration? Why, sir, he never dreamed of rejecting loyal men legally elected from the insurrectionary States. In the midst of the war he said that he would take the fact that insurrectionary States were represented in Congress as conclusive proof that no rebellion existed in those States. He invited representation. In his emancipation proclamation of September, 1862, he said:

"The Executive will, on the 1st day of January, 1863, designate the States and parts of States, if any, in which the people thereof respectively shall then be in rebellion against the United States; and the fact that any State, or the people thereof, shall on that day be in good faith represented in the Congress of the United States by members chosen thereto at elections wherein the majority of qualified voters of such States shall have participated, shall, in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence that such State, and the people thereof, are not in rebellion against the United States."

Thus we see, sir, that in the midst of the war he told these people to send their representatives here, and that he would regard that as conclusive proof that rebellion no longer existed in those States. And yet now, sir, men professing to be his friends, and the friends of his policy, tell these loyal men from the South that it is impossible that even the best and most loyal of them should be admitted into this Hall.

Sir, you have run away from that policy. You tell us that we are untrue to the policy of Abraham Lincoln; you tell us that we have abandoned his position, and are untrue to his policy of restoration. Why, sir, we have been trying every day to carry it out. We, the Andrew Johnson men upon this floor, have been endeavoring during this whole session to have these men admitted upon it. But we are in so small a minority, and such a powerful and willful—I say it in no offensive sense—majority is opposed to us that we are utterly powerless. We have not been able to get a hearing for anything looking to restoration; and not only that, but the citizens of those States which have been in rebellion, whether loyal or disloyal, are deprived of any right they may have to assert their claims upon the Treasury, or to occupy any position under the Government. My friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] some weeks ago offered a resolution by which they are debarred from admission to the West Point Academy. The children of these Tennessee soldiers, who have laid down their lives that the nation might live, when they come up and ask places at West Point are told that they cannot be allowed admission there. I would like to hear the gentleman's answer to one of these boys, whose father has fallen in the service of the country and whose mother has paid taxes to support the Government and has contributed to this fund for the support of West Point, when he applies for admission to that institution. I should like to know what he could say to such a son of such a father. And yet that resolution would deprive all the people of the insurrectionary States, without regard to whether they are loyal or disloyal, of the right to receive any of the advantages of West Point.

Now, if that is not frittering away all the results of this war, if that is not rendering null and of no effect all that we have striven to gain, I do not know what is. If anything worse than that could be done, I cannot imagine what it would be. It is placing the loyal and disloyal on the same footing, insisting that they shall all be disfranchised alike. I have only to say to the men on this floor who choose to turn their backs on the loyal men of the South, who have been true to them and to the cause of their country through this war, that if I had held out the inducements they did and then turned my back on them when the time for the exercise of power came, I would hang my head in shame; I would not look in the face of any gentleman whom I had so inveighed into riveting the shackles upon the limbs of his own people.

But we will not submit to this. There will be no trouble about it in time. We will have a hearing before the people, and then all this matter will be righted. I do not believe the people of this nation will give up the Government in this way. I do not believe they will allow any man, whether he claims to be loyal or disloyal, to destroy it. I do not believe they will allow the Union for which they fought so bravely to be broken up in this manner.

We have heard a great deal said about secession, and about its being a crime. I hold it to be as much of a crime as other men do, but did the doctrine of secession originate in the South? Not at all; it came from the very men who are now the bitterest and the most proscriptive in this time of the nation's trouble. It comes from the State of Massachusetts, from Josiah Quincy and John Quincy Adams, who taught secession to the men of the South.

Now, as long as John Quincy Adams lived I was one of his warmest admirers. When I was a boy I was an "Adams man," and I admire him to this day, although in his latter days he insisted upon the right of secession, as did Josiah Quincy, and taught it to these people of the South. Yet I denounced secession and do now all the same. Let me read you what John Quincy Adams said in 1843 about secession:

"We hesitate not to say that annexation [of Texas] effected by any act or proceeding of the Federal Government, or any of its Departments, would be identical with dissolution. It would be a violation of our national compact, its objects, designs, and the great elementary principles which entered into its formation, of a character so deep and fundamental, and would be an attempt to eternize an institution and power of a nature so unjust in themselves, so injurious to the interests and abhorrent to the feelings of the people of the free States, as in our opinion not only inevitably to result in a dissolution of the Union, but fully to justify it."

That, sir, is from John Quincy Adams, in a document published by him and signed by him and nine other members of Congress at that time. He insisted upon the right of breaking up the Government if Texas was annexed.

Josiah Quincy started the same theory long before on a question precisely similar. And I wish to read what he said on that subject. It is as follows:

"If this bill passes [for the admission of Louisiana] it is my deliberate opinion that it is virtually a dissolution of the Union, that it will free the States from their moral obligations, and as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, definitely to prepare for a separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must."

That is an extract from Gales & Seaton's Annals of Congress of 1810 and 1811, and, strange to say, Mr. Quincy gives the very same reasons that the secessionists gave when they began this effort to break up this Government, that when a contract was broken by one of the parties to it, of course the other party had a right to repudiate. He gave this reason:

"Is there a moral principle of public law better settled or more conformable to the plainest suggestions of reason than that the violation of a contract by one of the parties may be considered as exempting the others from its obligations?"

There, sir, is the beginning of the doctrine of secession. A portion of the southern people attempted to carry out this principle. We put it down; but let those who taught the doctrine not insist upon too much castigation of others for well learning what they so well taught.

Now, sir, I should be ashamed of myself if I should come upon this floor to arraign the people of Massachusetts, to denounce and abuse them for any opinions which may have been held by the leading men of that State; I should be ashamed of myself as a member of Congress, or as a private man, if I should do so unworthily a thing. But, sir, how often have we had these flings at the State of Kentucky.

And where do they come from? I wish, sir, to call the attention of the House to what was said a few days ago by a Senator from the State of Massachusetts; and I wish, once for all, to denounce this self-righteous conceit, let it come whence it may.

Senator WILSON, on the floor of the Senate, used this language:

"I have felt that this struggle, which was a contest of ideas, of thoughts, of acts, and of blood, was a logical and philosophical contest. It was a contest between men trained in the spirit of liberty; that spirit which embraces in its affections all the children of men of every clime and race; that spirit which pulls not the highest down, but lifts the lowest up, on the one hand, and on the other the dark, malignant spirit of slavery, which shrivels the mind and debases the soul. For two hundred years the one side had been trained to the love of freedom, justice, and humanity, and the other had been trained in the spirit of caste. It was a contest of giants; it was the irrepressible conflict; and it came to blows; and when it did come to blows it rocked the continent with its power. We have triumphed."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I protest against any corner of this nation, or any considerable portion of it, assuming to itself the right to give morals and laws to the remainder of the world; and I especially object, sir, when such an attempt is made by a portion of the country whence came not only the doctrine of secession and revolution, and appeals to resist the measures of Congress, but where was originated in this country the system of slavery itself. The first place, sir, upon this continent to which slaves were ever brought was Boston. I wish to detain the House a moment in showing that slavery had its origin on this continent in that portion of the United States, and that it legally continued there, though virtually abolished, but by law remaining until a very late day, a few months ago.

I read from Moore's History of Slavery in Massachusetts:

"Slavery having never been formally prohibited by legislation in Massachusetts, continued to 'subsist in point of law' until the year 1866, when the grand constitutional amendment terminated it forever throughout the limits of the United States. It would be not the least remarkable of the circumstances connected with this strange and eventful history, that although virtually abolished before, the actual prohibition of slavery in Massachusetts as well as Kentucky should be accomplished by the votes of South Carolina and Georgia."—Page 242.

Now, sir, I insist that it is not for the representatives of such a community to come here asserting that we shall learn our notions of morals or law or liberty from them. Sir, there is no doubt, from the evidence of history, that at an early day the leading men of Massachusetts did enslave their own race; enslaved the Indians; enslaved the negroes. They sold into bondage the children of Quakers, because the latter disagreed with them in reference to religious matters. They sold into slavery the Indians who had surrendered to them on a promise to be treated as prisoners of war.

I hold in my hand a book in which these facts are proved by historical and documentary evidence, and I have as yet seen no attempt at a contradiction of these statements in any of the papers of the country, although always alive to matters of this sort.

Now, sir, that Senator tells us that for two hundred years his people have been "trained to the love of freedom, justice, and humanity." Sir, I shall proceed to read some extracts from Moore's History of Slavery in Massachusetts. I find on page 207 advertisements published in that State as late as the year 1780, after the Declaration of Independence, by which all men were asserted to be free and equal.

From the Continental Journal, November 25, 1779:

"To be sold, a likely negro girl, sixteen years of age, for no fault, but want of employ."

From the same, December 16, 1790:

"To be sold, a strong, likely negro girl," &c.

From the Independent Chronicle, March 9, 1780:

"To be sold, for want of employment, an exceeding likely negro girl, aged sixteen."

From the same, March 30 and April 6, 1780:

"To be sold, very cheap, for no other reason than want of employ, an exceeding active negro boy, aged fifteen; also a likely negro girl, aged seventeen."

From the Continental Journal, August 17, 1780:

"To be sold, a likely negro boy."

From the same, August 24 and September 7:

"To be sold, or let for a term of years, a strong, hearty, likely negro girl."

From the same, October 26, 1780:

"To be sold, a likely negro boy, about thirteen years old, well calculated to wait on a gentleman. Inquire of the printer."

What do we have immediately after that?

"To be sold, a likely young cow and calf. Inquire of the printer."

[Laughter.]

From the Independent Chronicle, December 14, 21, and 28, 1780:

"A negro child, soon expected, of a good breed, may be owned by any person inclining to take it, and money with it."

Mr. Speaker, slavery is a crime. I know it, and perhaps as many wrongs have been done in the South as in any country where slavery has been permitted; but never, sir, have I heard that unborn children were sold or promised to be given away—never, sir, have I heard of that in the South. We have had great complaints about slavery in the South; we have heard of things which disgrace the South, the separation of mothers from their children, but southern man as I am, I have never yet heard of a child being sold down there or promised to be given away before it was born in order not to lose a day of the services of its mother.

Shall we, then, be told by gentlemen who live in this land where all these things have been done that they alone have been true in the cause of liberty, and that all the liberty we are to enjoy shall be taught and secured by them? Shall they come to teach us liberty? Are they the men who are fitted to do it? If this be the liberty and if these are the morals which they wish to bring into the South, in God's name, I say, let them keep them at home! We may be bad enough as it is, but we would be infinitely worse if we followed such teachings.

Much has been said about good, brave old Kentucky in this contest. It has been said she was one half on one side and one half on the other. Unjust flings have been made against her upon this floor.

Now, I wish to say that not only secession and slavery were inherited from Massachusetts, but, sir, this doctrine of neutrality also came from there. In 1812 Governor Strong, of Massachusetts, played exactly the same rôle as did Governor Magoffin in 1861. I want to call the attention of the House to the course Massachusetts then pursued. Holland, in the History of Western Massachusetts, volume one, page 326, uses the following language:

"The authorities of the United States and the government of Massachusetts came early in collision. Governor Strong was disposed to a strict construction of the Constitution; and as he, like the Northampton convention, could not see in the occasion any laws of the Union to be executed, insurrections to be suppressed, or invasions to be repelled, he declined accession to the requisition made for Massachusetts troops, to be placed at the command of the President."

Ah! is that the law? Is that the liberty the Senator from Massachusetts would teach us? Would he teach us to disobey the laws of the land, and skulk when called upon to fight the common enemy?

We have no such record as that in Kentucky. When Governor Magoffin was called upon to supply the quota of Kentucky of the seventy-five thousand men called out by the President, what did he do? He said that he would not give a man to the cause. He could not wait to write it, so he telegraphed it. The people of Massachusetts sustained Governor Strong. It is, therefore, with just pride that I draw a comparison between the people of Massachusetts and the people of Kentucky. Governor Magoffin refused to furnish men and arms, but what did the people of the State do? They furnished ninety thousand men to put down the rebellion. They appointed a military commission over Magoffin's head. They did not refuse to stand by the Government, as in the case of Massachusetts. There were men who, in spite of the Governor's proclamation, in spite of the authorities of the State, raised troops in defense of the Government, and when the time came they were there ready to do their duty, and did it.

Contrast Kentucky with Massachusetts. Contrast her with any State. She was called upon to strike the enemies of the nation in the late rebellion, and she said, "As our brethren, kindred, and friends are in the rebel army, let us wait a little. Let us have a little time. Let us not fight until we can talk the matter over. Do not insist that brothers shall plunge the bayonet into each other's breasts until we can have an opportunity to try other means of settlement." But how was it with Massachusetts in the war of 1812? Not a man raised his arm against a foreign enemy. They were a law-abiding people (?) and obeyed their authorities, and refused to come to the aid of the country.

Kentucky has begged the northern people to stand by the principles upon which we fought. We begged you to recognize the good men of the South so that what was known as the Union party there might exist. But you turned your backs coldly upon us; you would not even hear us. When you had few friends there we stood true to you and to the Government. All the denunciations of our enemies could not drive us from the Government and its friends. We were denounced as Hessians, as Yankees, and Lincoln hirelings. Why cannot you have the independence as your friends had there to overcome party feeling and stand upon the principles of your own platform at the outset of the war?

I ask the professed Union men of this House why they have abandoned us and the cause of the Union. It has been the constant habit here to make flings at my native State. I have told you what Massachusetts has been. I do not abuse the masses of that State. As I said before, I would be ashamed to hold them responsible for the acts of their ancestors. I only ask that they shall not, like Pharisees, insist that they are better than all other men, or that their State is better than all other States of the Union.

But again, Massachusetts was the first State in this Union where treason reared its ugly head. Holland, in his history, already referred to, gives an account of Shays's rebellion in Massachusetts. Of all the traitors in that rebellion but one man was punished, and that by being forced to sit upon the gallows with the rope about his neck for one hour. Shays himself, being pardoned by the Governor of Massachusetts, afterward drew a pension from the United States Government, for revolutionary services, till the day of his death.

Such is Massachusetts, who thanks God that she is not like other States, and such is Kentucky, who thanks God that she is no worse than she is. It is an easy thing to say hard words, to abuse and denounce men and communities; but, sir, of all the States in the Union—I say it without fear of contradiction—none has done so much, considering her means and resources, as the State of Kentucky to put down the late rebellion. In 1861, divided as she was, she took up arms and kept herself in the Union. Missouri and Maryland remained because Kentucky remained, and in my judgment by that saved the Union.

I know it is said by some northern non-combatants, stay-at-home patriots, that they would have been glad if Kentucky had seceded so that they might have whipped her back. I would like to see these persons try it. Why, sir, if you had changed the two hundred and fifty thousand soldiers from the loyal to the rebel side in the States of Maryland, Missouri, and Kentucky, do you think you would have conquered the rebellion? As it was, the best men often doubted the result; it was doubted what would be the result; and yet gentlemen who never whipped anybody talk about whipping back Kentucky!

I might to-day denounce the leading men who gave us all this trouble, the persistent rebels, such as Wise and Slidell, according to the feeling of resentment which I entertain for them, if it had not already been done on this floor to such an extent that I am ashamed to add anything further.

We talk often about guarantees. Guarantees for what? Are you afraid of the rebels? They are disarmed, helpless, and prostrate, and unable, if they would, to trouble you any more; and yet you demand guarantees. Guarantees such as the lion might ask from his victim crushed and overcome. We are strong; we have all the arms and munitions of war, all the armies and all the resources; we have a starving, humiliated, dying people prostrate before us, and yet we talk of guarantees!

Mr. WINDOM obtained the floor.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the time of the gentleman from Kentucky will be extended.

Mr. PRICE. I must object to any extension of time.

Mr. BANKS. I trust the gentleman's time will be extended. It is a courtesy which has always been granted to gentlemen heretofore this session.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DUMONT. I appeal to the gentleman from Iowa to allow the time of the gentleman from Kentucky to be extended.

Mr. PRICE. I would do so cheerfully, but there are other parties whose rights are involved.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I trust the gentleman from Iowa will not persist in his objection. There has not been a single occasion when this privilege has been asked by gentlemen upon the other side of the House that it has not been unanimously granted.

Mr. ROGERS. Always.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. There has never been an occasion on which it has not been unanimously accorded by us.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to an extension of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. PRICE. I was only acting as the agent for other parties. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should go on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I am obliged to the gentleman from Iowa, whether acting as the agent of others, or acting for himself, and to the House for the courtesy extended to me.

I was saying that we constantly hear talk here about guarantees. I ask, what do we want with guarantees from the insurrectionary States? What right has the nation to ask guarantees from a portion of the people? A guarantee, to be worth anything, and mean anything, ought to be binding on all the people and all the States alike. I deny the right to demand of Massachusetts guarantees which are not demanded of South Carolina, and vice versa. I insist that a guarantee, to be binding at all, ought to be binding upon the whole people of the United States. And, sir, it is a paltry excuse to talk about danger from the southern States. We have conquered the people there. They will never be in power again in our time, and perhaps never again as compared with the balance of the nation. Mr. Speaker, the men who have put down this rebellion, the soldiers of the war, have no fear of the rebels either with or without arms, and, sir, strip them as they are now stripped, and who can lay his hand upon his heart and say that he fears them?

I said, sir, awhile ago, that flings had been constantly made at my native State, in my hearing, upon this floor; and last and least of all things and everybody, let us give a moment's attention to the member from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL,] who first assailed her here. Shortly after Congress assembled he assailed my State and myself; he charged that I had degraded my native State by saying that I would defend my family against the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. That member was pleased to say on the floor, in answer to a suggestion of my colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] that he did not know whether I had fought four years on the rebel side or on the Federal side in the late war.

I had under my command and fighting under me from that member's State, some of the bravest troops from any State in the Union. I was in the war from the beginning of it until the end. In the Northwest I was known to have been in the Federal Army; but that member said he did not know whether I was on the rebel or the Federal side. I do not suppose a member in the House believed one word of what he said.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ROUSSEAU. No, sir; I cannot be interrupted now. I wish to say that when a member can so far depart from what everybody believes he ought to know, and does know is the truth, it is a degradation, not to his State, for he cannot degrade her, but to himself. Iowa is not to be degraded by any one or even by all of her members on this floor. She is a gallant State, and I know what her people are.

Mr. Speaker, this Congress must soon adjourn, and when it does we will submit the question which this Congress has failed to settle to the people of the United States. I have no doubt of the result of that submission. I do not believe that the Union men of this nation will either see this Government go to pieces or see a reunion obstructed or procrastinated. I think they believe that peace means something; that it does not mean war at the ballot-box, war in the churches, war in social life, but that they believe that peace will be promoted by the restoration of the Union.

I believe the soldiers of this nation will take care of the Government they have saved, and, for one, I will join in an appeal to them to come forward and maintain that Government and take care of it now, as they did in the days of the rebellion. The soldiers of this country will not turn a deaf ear to those who desire to save the Government from every enemy. We will appeal to them as we did in time of danger and of death, and they will respond as they did then, when they fought with but one purpose on earth, and that was to save the Government.

And you may husband all your powers of denunciation, all your sources of irritation; you may appeal to all the bad feelings and passions, because they have stood you in good stead heretofore. If ever you yield for one moment, if you will only allow it, the lately beligerent sections will embrace and be friends. If Congress will but stand aside, the contending factions will come together and restore the Union. All has been done but one thing, namely, the admission of representatives from the States lately in rebellion; and Congress will not do that, but upon a hearing the people will direct this to be done, and then this war will not have been fought in vain.

Mr. WINDOM resumed the floor.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman yield to me for ten or fifteen minutes?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire to go on to-day, and if I can yield for fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] without losing my right to the floor or having it come out of my time I will do so.

The SPEAKER. That arrangement can be made only by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to give notice that when my colleague [Mr. PRICE] shall have concluded his remarks I shall claim the floor for a personal explanation in reply to some remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU,] who, I hope, will remain here and listen to what I may have to say.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I shall remain, and endeavor to hear patiently what may be said.

CLAIMS AGAINST VENEZUELA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th ultimo, calling for information relative to the claims of citizens of the United States against the republic of Venezuela, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1866.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, the message, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF SIOUX INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the acting Secretary of the Interior, communicating information requested by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st ultimo in relation to the removal of the Sioux Indians, of Minnesota, and the provision made for their accommodation in the Territory of Nebraska.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 9, 1866.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. PRICE. I presume I need not assure the House that I have not risen to make a speech. And if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] had allowed me to put in Colonel Stokes's remarks upon the question of restoration, I would not have asked the privilege of detaining the House at this time for even ten minutes.

I do not propose to discuss the question whether Massachusetts or Kentucky are most at fault for keeping alive the institution of slavery. I do not propose to discuss the question whether we are the parties who with the poniard drew the blood of our brothers unprovoked and without cause. I do not propose, at this late hour, to go into any of these questions, whether immediately or remotely connected with the institution of slavery. I am very thankful, however, that I have lived to see the day when slavery with all its incidents and concomitants, I hope, is dead, and nothing remains but to have its dead carcass buried out of sight, never to be resurrected.

But I have risen to say just a few words, within the limit of time which has been allowed to me, in reference to the difference between the President and Congress on the question of reconstruction. I think it of vital importance to the country that that question should not be misunderstood, for in my opinion upon the decision of that question depends the weal or the woe of this country for all time to come; and not only of this country, but of all countries for all the years of the coming future. And the men of this Congress have the privilege, and I thank God for my belief that they have the power, to establish now the institutions of this country upon a basis that shall be so broad and so deep that the revolutions of all the future will not be able to unsettle them in the least degree whatever, and for the proper exercise of this power the country and the world will hold us to a strict account.

I say, that in view of the great questions that now agitate the minds of the American people, I think it of great importance that the people of this nation should not be misled in regard to the difference which now exists between the radical members of this Congress and the President of the United States. I understand that difference to be simply this: the President insists that the States recently in rebellion shall be, and should have been at the commencement of this session, unconditionally admitted to representation upon this floor; at least without any condition-precedent, except the one that their Representatives shall be loyal men.

Mr. ANCONA. And legally elected.

Mr. PRICE. And legally elected; that in reference to the condition of the States, and in reference to the condition of the constituencies by which these men were sent here, no inquiry, no investigation, no judgment should be given by the Congress of the United States; that, indeed, there was to be no power in Congress to direct or even to advise how this should be done so as to secure the safety of the nation in the future. This is purely a difference of opinion which might fairly exist between honest men inside of this Hall and the President. Each, I grant you, has a perfect right to his own opinion on this subject, but neither has the right to proscribe the other because of that opinion. But I am sorry, sir, to be compelled to say in this House, in the hearing of the country, that the President has so far forgotten himself and the position which he occupies as to proscribe men simply for the expression of that opinion. This is a fact so patent that no man in his senses dares to deny it, for official heads are falling almost every hour into the basket prepared for that purpose, and for no other reason but because of a difference of opinion with the President on this question.

But I rose more particularly to reply to a remark of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] when speaking of the gentlemen elected from the State of Tennessee. So far as I know them they are loyal men. Some I know are, but I do not know them all. Now, when he referred to those gentlemen as indorsing his statement that they opposed the action of Congress and sustained the action of the President on this great subject, which at this time is agitating this country and the world; I say when he named Colonel Stokes, I thought it was a pretty good opportunity to let Colonel Stokes speak for himself. If I had been allowed to read what Colonel Stokes said on the subject I would not have troubled the House with these few crude remarks.

The gentlemen who come from Tennessee are good men. No man upon this floor will receive them with more open arms or give them a more cordial welcome when the hour arrives that they can be admitted with safety to the Union than I will. I think they are entitled to great credit for the noble stand which they took during the troublous times of the late civil conflict. I say that when the safety of the country will justify the reception of these men upon this floor as members of Congress no man will go further and no man will be more rejoiced than I will be. I ask it to go upon the record, that when I express these sentiments I only express the opinions of the radical members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Colonel Stokes risked his life on the battlefield in support of the Government, and has been elected by as loyal a constituency as any gentleman from Tennessee; and I think he ought to be presumed to know as much about the matter as the gentleman from Kentucky. He goes before the people and gives his statement of the whole question. I am perfectly willing that the people of the United States shall, on his statement, decide between Congress and the President. We are told by the friends of the President that the battle is to be fought at the ballot-box on the second Tuesday of October next, and later this fall. Yes, sir, the battle is to be fought there, and there it is expected to defeat the radicals and hand the country over to the men who favor the President's policy. Well, sir, we are prepared to meet them. We only want the issue to be fairly understood. We want the people to know before they deposit their ballots who have been to blame, whether Congress or the President. When the question is fairly submitted I have a perfect confidence on which side success will be. I am perfectly willing to let the case go to the jury of the country and abide the judgment. I feel confident it will not be with those who sustain the policy of the President.

Now, what does Colonel Stokes say? He knows what he talks about. Notwithstanding what my friend from Kentucky has said about slavery in Massachusetts and slavery in Kentucky, I am perfectly willing to let the people decide the question at the ballot-box on the testimony of Colonel Stokes. Let me read what he says:

"But it is said a radical Congress will not admit Union men of the South. I am one of those men, and an applicant for a seat in Congress. I believe when the proper time comes Congress will do its duty in regard to Tennessee and any other State that takes the same position. Why is it not done now? We have had a war for four or five years. You cannot expect Congress to heal all these differences in a few days. It was their duty to examine the condition of the government of these States, to examine their constitutions and laws, and when their loyal government is properly established to recognize it, and then one point is settled. After that comes the question as to the qualification of members. Congress had a right to proscribe a test oath, and I say here that I would sit in my seat until I froze to death before I would ever vote to repeal that oath until the southern people and their papers show a different tone toward the Union men of the South."

"Now, the President has said himself that Congress must declare the State government properly established before it can become valid. Why, then, are these States not admitted? Because they have not complied with the President's own requirements? But Tennessee has; why is she not admitted? I will tell you. Congress asked for evidence as to these States. It asked for the proclamations, constitutions, documents, laws. The President never sent them to Congress until March. But meanwhile it had been gathering proof from other quarters, and at length it was just ready to admit Tennessee. Then one branch of the Legislature was disorganized, and the rebel element, not being willing to submit to the rule of the majority, sought to break up and destroy the government. They left the House without a quorum, and it is still without a quorum. And I say that while the government was in that condition, there is not a man of you who would think that State should be recognized. We therefore do not complain of the delay. We know that admission now would destroy the Union element of those States. Congress is doing right in holding them back. When the rebel armies first surrendered, there was everywhere a disposition toward loyalty; but I stand here to-night to say that there is now a feeling as bitter toward the Union men of the South as there ever was in 1860 or 1861. And the facts have proved that Congress, in its cool and deliberate treatment of the matter, deserves the thanks of all Union men in giving opportunity for these rebels to show their hands. Time will show that Congress was right. But all these things will be settled wisely and safely, and when loyal men get control of these governments there will then be no difficulty, and all these questions will be satisfactorily settled. In Tennessee we shall elect new members to make a quorum on Saturday next; then the franchise bill, securing control to loyal men, will pass; and then I have no doubt that Congress will act promptly and rightly."

There, sir, is the opinion of a man who lives in Tennessee, a loyal man, an honest man, a fearless man, in whose face these doors have been shut for seven long months, and yet he to-day tells us that we are doing right. If we are doing right, as a matter of course the President must be doing wrong in opposing us. He says we are not only doing right, but that the loyal people of the country ought to, and will, give us their applause because we are doing right in this matter. Stronger testimony than that can hardly be adduced upon this question. It bears directly upon the point and comes from a man fresh from the battle-field where he has been contending with red-handed traitors.

And here are a couple of resolutions which I want to have read, adopted a few days since by the Union men of Tennessee—the bone and sinew of that State, who, when she comes in again under the old flag will be the men who will carry it in the forefront of the advancing column of freedom:

Resolved, That we unite with our brother radicals of Tennessee in a feeling of esteem for and confidence in those two unflinching patriots and statesmen, Charles Sumner and Thaddeus Stevens, who have defended them in Congress against the calumnies of their enemies, and that we tender the heartfelt thanks of the Union men of Tennessee for their efforts, in connection with the Union party of Congress, to establish a policy by which, in the language of our late President, alias 'my policy,' 'traitors may be punished and treason made odious.'

Resolved, That the ex-rebels of Tennessee, who, by their own acts, voluntarily renounced the principles of the elective franchise, and freely took up arms to destroy a Union to which they only returned when all their efforts had failed, have thereby forfeited all claim to American citizenship and are only in the Union, as reconstructed traitors and paroled prisoners."

There is the indorsement of Mr. Stokes's constituency after having read the speech before referred to and having had time for consideration. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the testimony of the men who are immediately interested, and are personally cognizant of all the facts and circumstances connected with these matters from the beginning to the end of the war, and they are satisfied, and if they are, should any one else complain?

And now, sir, thanking the House for its indulgence, I only say, that with the help of God and the strong right arms of the loyal men of this country and the clear consciences in the breasts of the radicals in Congress and in the country, we intend to reconstruct this Union and take in the honest men of the rebel States, not only as prodigals, but as brethren. The loyal and true men, both North and South, do not want this done until it can be done with perfect safety to the whole country.

Mr. WINDOM resumed the floor.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the gentleman to yield a few moments.

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest reluctance that I rise to say anything which might seem personal. I have been a member of this House for three sessions, and in all that time I have had no personal controversy save with the member from Kentucky, and no unkind feeling toward any person in the House. I claim to be a man of peace and to demean myself as becomes a gentleman. But, sir, when any man, I care not whether he stands six feet high, whether he wears buff and assumes the air of a certain bird that has a more than usual extremity of tail, wanting in the other extremity, says that he would not believe what I utter, I will say that I was never called to stand under an imputation of that character in the company of gentlemen.

The member begins courting sympathy by sustaining the President of the United States, preparatory to his assault upon me. Now, sir, if he is a defender of the President of the United States, all I have to say is, Heaven save the President from such an incoherent defender.

But his military record, who has read it? In what volume of history is it found?

Yet some time ago the gentleman asked some of us, "What did you do in the rebellion but make speeches?" And he told us that he was in the field, and made sacrifices with regulars, &c. Since he has alluded to Iowa, I will give the opinion of a leading officer from that State, for not two weeks ago he told me that when there was a noise in camp, the men said, it is either a rabbit or a general R. He the defender of the soldiers of Iowa! Sir, they want no such defender; they need none of his defense. He has not led our regiments in campaigns, and it is all pretense; it is the merest mockery; it is the merest trickery, the merest blowing of his own horn for him to say that he led our soldiers to victory in the deadly hail under his command. But he comes here to traduce a humble person like myself. In the first place, he charged me with saying what I never did say. When he went down to make a speech to the meeting in New York, he is reported to have said this:

"As I said on the floor of Congress on one occasion, as a fling was made at my native State by a pitiable politician from Iowa. [Hisss.] You will excuse me for giving his name; but I believe it was one Grinnell."

It was "one Grinnell" that he alluded to. But I never made any fling at Kentucky. But that is not all. He was not content with using my name, but he refers to an honorable gentleman of this House in these terms: "I say that man is a miscreant, and I cannot find words to express my disgust and contempt for him." To whom does that relate—to a member of this House?

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Is this sort of debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa had permission to make a personal explanation. If the gentleman raises the question as to personalities, the Chair will decide it.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Shall I be held responsible for newspaper reports?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

Mr. BANKS. I do not understand that in giving consent to the gentleman from Iowa the House gave consent to him to make personal allusions which are not justified by the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. They do not; but it is the rule, as the gentleman well knows, having occupied the chair himself, that when leave is granted to a member to make a personal explanation the Chair does not check personalities, but waits for some member to make the point of order.

Mr. BANKS. I understand the gentleman's privilege to be to state what he regards necessary to explain his own position.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order on the gentleman from Iowa the Chair will decide it.

Mr. BANKS. I do make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and decides that the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa are personal and out of order.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. If the Speaker does not protect me from such remarks I must protect myself.

Mr. GRINNELL. I was alluding to remarks made by the member from Kentucky. If he says he did not make those remarks, of course I have nothing further to say. I refer to this in reply to the premeditated assault that has been made upon me.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I did not say that THADDEUS STEVENS was a miscreant, and there is no evidence of it.

Mr. GRINNELL. The evidence I find in the reports of three New York newspapers, one of which is before me.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. What I said was that the man who placed himself between the recently contending sections to keep them apart was a miscreant. I did not say that Mr. STEVENS was a miscreant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point. The gentleman from Iowa is out of order in this course of remark; and as the gentleman has been twice called to order, the Chair will check him, if he again violate the rules.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, I resume to say that the charge that I have insulted Kentucky, which is made the ground of a fling at me, is altogether a mistake. I never insulted Kentucky. I did say that when the member from Kentucky said that he would shoot an officer in the discharge of his duty, he made a remark unworthy, as I thought, of his State and of a United States officer. That I fastened upon the member, and that I regard as the occasion of his assault to-day. I proved, too, what I said on that subject.

Now, sir, I wish to deny any unfriendliness toward the member or toward the State of Kentucky, and that I ever made any remark which could be construed to mean anything unfriendly in that respect. So far from that being the case, I have held Kentucky in high regard, her early history and statesmen.

Now, sir, why should I speak of this matter? Certainly not because I believe that my constituency would doubt my word, but allusion has been made to the soldiers of the different States. I am proud to say that I represent a district that sent thirteen thousand men into the Army. Can the gentleman say so much for his district of which he boasts? I did speak something about the men from Kentucky fighting on both sides; but the record of Iowa soldiers is unquestioned, and it was not made under the leadership of any Kentucky general on this floor. It was made under the leadership of their own colonels and generals, and under General Grant and General Sherman, Sheridan, and others.

Mr. Speaker, this is a painful exposition. But I am not responsible for it. When I make an assault, I expect to receive an assault in return. I have never assaulted my equals and associates, and therefore I am not in the habit of receiving assaults in return. I have never risen here to question the integrity or doubt the veracity of any gentleman on this floor; and but for the fact that my personal integrity was assailed and that my words were misquoted, I would not have risen here to-day. I have alluded to what was said in regard to me. The gentleman remarked that he did not care a fig about what I said; but when he goes and proclaims the matter in a great city in the presence of thousands of people, I conclude that he does not rest altogether well satisfied under the well-proven charge of having declared that he would shoot an officer of the United States on duty under certain circumstances. And then the member whines off with a woman's plea, taking refuge under feminine skirts, as a certain other gentleman in rebellion went off in disguise.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the remarks of the gentleman are out of order.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to say a word or two.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the gentleman from Kentucky making a personal explanation?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that in what I may say I shall not follow the example of the member from Iowa, but shall deport myself in a manner worthy of my position here.

Sir, when making some remarks in this House on a former occasion, I alluded to the outrages committed by agents of the Freedmen's Bureau in the city of my home. I stated a case in which a man with his wife and daughters were about to be arrested and held over night, and then tried in the morning by an unauthorized person, the agent of the bureau; that they had appealed for protection to General Watkins, the commander of the post at Louisville, and I joined in insisting that they should be protected. In alluding to that, I said that if any man, without lawful authority, acting in defiance of the laws and Constitution, though claiming to act under the authority of Congress—asserting the right to act as judge, sheriff, and jailor; all combined in the same person—should treat my family in that way, I would defend them, and though blood came from it, I would strike for my family. That was what I said.

So far was I from supposing that in those remarks I had offended any one, that observing the person then occupying the chair [Mr. GRINNELL] to be so exceedingly polite to me during my speech I asked a gentleman the next morning to introduce me to him that I might thank him for his attention to me. Hence I was much surprised to learn from the Globe a day or two afterward that I was charged by him with having uttered sentiments that degraded my State; that I had threatened to shoot an officer in the discharge of his duty. Why, sir, it was not the duty but against the duty of this man to make an arrest of this sort, to invade the privacy of a man's family and to outrage the laws by a violation of personal rights; and it was this I complained of.

Sir, there was no reason for that assault upon me. I replied to it upon that occasion in what seemed to me fitting terms, and the matter passed by. To-day, in alluding to the State of Kentucky, I referred to it again. The member from Iowa had said very cavalierly and with much contempt that he did not know whether I fought on one side or on the other, on the rebel or on the Federal side. I have said to-day, and believe now that members will sustain me in the assertion, that he did know on which side I fought.

Mr. GRINNELL. I never said that.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Well, if the Globe does not bear me out in my statement of the member's language I will acknowledge that I have been mistaken. What the member said was that he did not know whether I had fought four years on the Federal or four years on the rebel side, but that I had uttered a sentiment which degraded my State. That is my recollection of the matter, and I am sure that I am not mistaken.

Mr. GRINNELL. What I said was that I did not care whether the gentleman had fought on the one side or the other.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Sir, the member's language, as I have quoted it according to my best recollection, seemed to me at the time to be highly improper and exceedingly unjust. The first declaration was that I degraded my State by having uttered that sentiment. Now, sir, I believe there is not a member in my hearing, unless it be the member from Iowa, who would not utter the same sentiment, and who would not do what I declared I would do—who would not stand by his wife and children in defending their rights when illegally and oppressively invaded. The man who would not do this is unworthy of the name of man, and I believe that even the member from Iowa himself would not prove so recreant to all the principles of manhood.

That member has been pleased to-day to make some personal allusions to me. I will not resent anything he can say, because, as I understand, he declares that he cannot be insulted. With such a man I can have no quarrel, and because I look with utter contempt upon anything he could say.

Mr. GRINNELL. No, sir, I never said that.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. There is one incident which that member has mentioned about which I desire to say a word. He refers to an anecdote which may be found in the Annals of the Army of the Cumberland—a history of the war in the West. This anecdote was told by General Jeff. C. Davis one evening at table with General Rosecrans and some thirty officers, to the great amusement of all. The matter is this: I had been absent from the Army, visiting this city, endeavoring to get leave to raise some troops. On my return, wherever I went, my troops cheered me, as was their custom after an absence. Cheering among the troops at that time was somewhat unusual; for I regret to say that at the beginning of the war there was not so much enthusiasm with regard to general officers as could have been wished. This cheering always created a commotion in the camp. There was also another cause of shouting and cheering.

The soldiers, whole regiments, often got after a rabbit, and surrounding him, would shout and chase him almost scaring him to death till they caught him. Such shouting and cheering occurring one day, General Jeff. C.

Davis, as he stated at General Rosecrans's table, as before mentioned, asked the sentinel before his door what it meant, who replied he did not know, but supposed it was either Rousseau or a rabbit. The whole Army is acquainted with the joke, and the member from Iowa can find it in the book referred to, set down as a compliment to me. It was, in fact, a by-word in the army of the Cumberland. I was proud of it, for it evinced my popularity with the brave men I commanded.

I care very little what such a man as that member may say of my department as a soldier. I tell that member, sir, there are more than fifty regiments from the great Northwest who served under me, and the history of no one of them can be truthfully written in which my name will not be honorably mentioned. Go to the men from Iowa, the member's own State, and I will give my right arm if he can find one of them, from the highest to the lowest, who will not testify to my soldierly bearing in all things. Thank God, my name shall go down to posterity linked in honor with theirs. We endured together the hardships, and faced the dangers of a soldier's life, and we have reason to know and respect each other.

The member is mistaken when he says no Iowa troops were under me. The fifth Iowa cavalry, Lieutenant Colonel Patrick, were with me on various occasions and fought under me. They were among the best of my command in the expedition which destroyed thirty-five miles of the most important railroad one hundred and thirty miles in the rear of Johnston's army while in front of Atlanta. Let that member read the history of troops from his own State, or let him ask any man of the fifth Iowa cavalry who was their commander in crossing the Coosa river and in repelling the various raids of Forrest and Wheeler.

I have a warm place in my heart for the soldiers of the Union, and when I speak of them I must say what I feel.

If I am six feet high, as the member has said, it is no fault of mine—I am as God made me; and if I have had courage to serve my country I am thankful. I thank God I have had the courage and strength to do it. I have never dreamed of making a parade of it, and certainly not when I call upon par excellence stay-at-home patriots upon this floor, who denounce the friends of the President as lickspittles, to know in what manner they have served their country except in denouncing rebels, filling offices, and drawing salaries.

I hope now that I have heard the last of the member from Iowa. I hope I shall never have occasion to recur to the subject again. Whatever glory he has gained in this contest I am content he should wear.

Mr. GRINNELL. The occasion is no fault of mine.

And then, on motion of Mr. THAYER, (at four o'clock and fifty-eight minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 12, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Darius Ferris, of Westport, New York, praying for a pension on account of naval services rendered in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a petition of citizens of Marengo, a petition of citizens of Galena, a petition of citizens of Geneva, and a petition of citizens of Freeport, all in the State of Illinois, praying for the passage of a bankrupt law; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRIMES presented a petition of John McNally, and others, employés around the President's House and grounds under the administration of Mr. Lincoln, praying for compensation for extra services rendered by them; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition of merchants of the city of Baltimore, engaged in the importation of coffee, sugar, &c., praying that the benefit of the provision in the bill now pending relating to sales made by or authorized through another wholesale dealer on commission, shall be so extended in the case of commercial brokers as to exempt them from the payment of a tax on sales of any goods, wares, or merchandise in cases where a tax on the sales is paid by wholesale dealers as such; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Abraham Lansing, who was in the naval service in the war of 1812, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 366) granting a pension to Abraham Lansing. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Niagara Ship Canal Company, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CONNESS. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 98) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China," approved February 17, 1865, have instructed me to make a report in writing. This is a joint resolution concerning the application of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for a release from that portion of their contract which required them to stop at the Sandwich Islands on their route to Japan and China. The committee recommend the passage of the resolution. I will state that the report embraces some very valuable statistical and other information furnished from many sources; a very valuable report from the Postmaster General upon this subject. I therefore move that, in addition to the usual number of copies of the report, one thousand additional copies be printed; which motion, I suppose, will go to the Committee on Printing. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will go to the Committee on Printing, and the printing of the usual number of the report will be ordered.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 123) for the relief of Elizabeth Woodward and George Chorpennig, of Pennsylvania, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution for printing extra copies of the report of the reconstruction committee, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and to recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That fifty thousand additional copies of the report of the joint committee on reconstruction be printed for the use of the Senate.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I ask that a week's leave of absence be granted to my colleague, [Mr. WILEY.]

Leave was granted.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Report of the Commissioner of Patents for 1893, when prepared, be printed, and that four thousand extra copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

ARMY OFFICERS' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 406) to provide for the settlement of accounts of certain public officers, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. It will take but a moment, and it is very important that the bill should be passed. I ask, therefore, that it be put upon its passage at once.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that all moneys raised in the United States for the support of refugees or freedmen, and received by any officer of the United States Army, shall be charged against such officer on the books of the Treasury Department and accounted for by him in like manner as if such moneys had been drawn from the Treasury of the United States, and if any part thereof shall have been expended for the use of refugees or freedmen, the same shall be passed to the credit of the officer, if, upon examination of his accounts, it shall appear to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury that the amount expended was properly disbursed for such refugees or freedmen, and on the adjustment of the accounts of the officer, if any balance shall remain in his hands it shall be paid into the Treasury for a fund for the relief of refugees and freedmen. Any officer having such balance in his hands, who, after being duly required, shall refuse or neglect to pay it over, or who shall, after due notice, fail to settle his account, shall be proceeded against in the same manner as is provided for by existing laws in the case of disbursing officers who neglect or refuse to account for moneys drawn from the Treasury of the United States. Where accounts are rendered for expenditures for refugees or freedmen, under the approval and sanction of the proper officers, and which shall have been proper and necessary, but cannot be settled for want of specific appropriations, the same may be paid out of the fund for the relief of refugees and freedmen, on the approval of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees and Freedmen.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 492—the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 492) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under authority of law, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Commerce reported the bill with several amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line one hundred and fifty, after the word "river" to insert the word "Michigan;" so as to make the clause read:

For improvement at the mouth of Saginaw river, Michigan, $67,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line one hundred and seventy-four, to strike out the word "twenty" before the word "thousand" and to insert "thirty;" and after the word "thousand" to insert "five hundred;" so that the clause will read:

For improvement of the harbor of Green Bay, at the mouth of Fox river, Wisconsin, $30,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line one hundred and eighty-three, after the word "harbor" to insert the words "and the use by such vessels of the erections or works to which this appropriation may be applied;" so that the clause will read:

For constructing works and improving the entrance into the harbor of Michigan City, Indiana, $75,000: Provided, That it shall be first shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that a sum equal to double the amount aforesaid has been expended by the Michigan City Harbor Company in the construction of a safe and convenient harbor at that place: And provided, That the passage of vessels to and from said harbor, and the use by such vessels of the erections or works to which this appropriation may be applied, shall be free and not subject to toll or charge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was at the end of the first section, to insert the following:

For improvement of the Kennebec river, in the State of Maine, between Shoppard point and the city of Augusta, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the first section the following:

For removal of obstructions to navigation in the Willamette river, between Portland and its mouth, in the State of Oregon, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line thirteen, to strike out the word "at" and insert the word "of;" in line fourteen, to strike out the words "Fort Snelling and;" and in line fifteen, after the words "falls of St. Anthony" to insert the following words:

And the upper or Rock river rapids of the Mississippi river, with a view to ascertain the most feasible means, by economizing the water of the stream, of insuring the passage, at all navigable seasons, of boats drawing four feet of water; of the Minnesota river, from its mouth to the Yellow Medicine river, in order to ascertain the practicability and expense, by slack-water navigation or otherwise, of securing the continued navigability of said stream during the usual season of navigation; and for examining and reporting upon the subject of constructing railroad bridges across the Mississippi river, between St. Paul, in Minnesota, and St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, upon such plans of construction as will offer the least impediment to the navigation of the river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line twenty-eight, to strike out the words "at Beef Slough bar, on the Mississippi river."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section four the following:

And the Secretary of War shall cause a survey to be made at the harbor of Burlington, Vermont, and the harbor of Dunkirk, New York; at the harbor of Oak Orchard creek, New York, and at Muskegon, White river, Manistee, and New Buffalo, in the State of Michigan; the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, in the State of Wisconsin; and the Rock river, in the States of Illinois and Wisconsin, with its connections with Lake Winnebago; and the upper Columbia river, Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to; and the fourth section, as amended, reads thus:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause examinations or surveys, or both, as aforesaid, to be made at the following points, namely: at Superior City, Eagle Harbor, Marquette, and Lac la Belle, on Lake Superior, and at Ausable river, in the State of Michigan; of the Ohio river between Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and Bufington Island, West Virginia; of Sandusky river, Ohio; at Chester harbor Pennsylvania; at Bridgeport, Connecticut; at Hell Gate, New York; at the port of Ogdensburg, New York; at San Francisco, California; at the Grand Chain, in the Ohio river; at the harbor of Baltimore, between Fort McHenry and the mouth of the Patapsco river, in the State of Maryland; of the Mississippi river, between the falls of Saint Anthony and the upper or Rock river rapids of the Mississippi river, with a view to ascertain the most feasible means, by economizing the water of the stream, of insuring the passage, at all navigable seasons, of boats drawing four feet of water; of the Minnesota river, from its mouth to the Yellow Medicine river, in order to ascertain the practicability and expense, by slack-water navigation or otherwise, of securing the continued navigability of said stream during the usual season of navigation; and for examining and reporting upon the subject of constructing railroad bridges across the Mississippi river, between St. Paul, in Minnesota, and St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, upon such plan of construction as will offer the least impediment to the navigation of the river; of Rock river; the Kennebec river above Gardiner, Maine; the Penobscot river above Hampden, Maine; at the Zambro river, Minnesota; at the Cannon river, Minnesota; at the harbor and the mouth of the Eighteen-mile creek, at Alcott, New York; at St. Croix river, above the ledge; from the mouth of Illinois river to La Salle; together with such necessary estimates of cost, as hereinbefore provided, as will enable the Secretary of War to determine what improvements and public works shall be necessary at the respective points aforesaid. And the Secretary of War shall cause a survey to be made at the harbor of Burlington, Vermont, and the harbor of Dunkirk, New York; at the harbor of Oak Orchard creek, New York, and at Muskegon, White river, Manistee, and New Buffalo, in the State of Michigan; the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, in the State of Wisconsin; and the Rock river, in the States of Illinois and Wisconsin, with its connections with Lake Winnebago; and the upper Columbia river, Oregon.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to offer this amendment, to come in at the close of the first section of the bill:

For continuing the repair of the piers in Saco river, in the State of Maine, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill by striking out in the second section the following words:

The Secretary of War, before expending any part of the money herein appropriated, shall, where the public interests require it, cause a reexamination and resurvey of the public works hereby appropriated for; and he is hereby authorized to change or modify the present plan if in his opinion the public interest will be materially benefited thereby.

That provision throws the whole bill into the hands and at the discretion of the engineer in charge of these works, and I know by experience that it is rather uncertain what he will do. It gives him an arbitrary discretion, with a great chance of favoritism, that I do not think he ought to have. These surveys have been made hitherto by competent engineers. All the works provided for in the bill that I know anything about are old works that have got somewhat out of repair, but their usefulness everybody knows; the country has known it for years; there have been appropriations made for them. Now, it is proposed before anything is done, that the engineer may cause, where he pleases, a resurvey to be made, and no money is to be expended until he shall make a resurvey and himself arbitrarily point out where the money shall be expended. It is no more nor less than just referring the whole matter to him. If that provision remains, the bill need contain but a single section providing that the engineer shall make such improvements in rivers and harbors as he thinks will be beneficial to the public interests. I think it is too broad a discretion, especially when the utility of these works is well known, when large sums of money have been expended on them, when they are essential to the safe navigation of our rivers and lakes. I speak more particularly in regard to the lake harbors, which I know more about and in which I take more particular interest. I think no harbor upon the western lakes is provided for in this bill the utility of the improvement of which is not perfectly well known, and it is almost indispensable for navigation that they should be kept in repair.

Now, it is proposed to leave it to the engineer to say whether these works shall be carried on or not, to order a resurvey where he sees fit, and not to expend the money on any of the works unless he shall see fit to do so. I believe that last year we made an appropriation of a sum to be expended under the direction of the engineer where he thought best.

He did expend it where he thought best; there was a universal scramble for his opinion. I do not think it ought to be so. It is a foregone conclusion in regard to most of the places named in this bill where improvements are provided for. There are some of them, to be sure, that are new to me and about which I know nothing and have nothing to say; but the great mass of them are old works which have been prosecuted on according to surveys made in former years. This provision which I have moved to strike out gives the engineer a broad discretion to say that they are not useful, and that no money shall be expended upon them. I think such a provision is unusual in bills of this nature, and I hope it will not be retained here.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, in considering this bill, have consulted with the engineers and with the committee of the other House, and after mature consideration have recommended the clause which the Senator from Ohio moves to strike out. It is well known that many of these surveys were made a long time ago, and recommendations were made a long time ago, which now it may be deemed expedient to change. This provision simply leaves with the Secretary of War the discretion of making such changes as he thinks best. I hope the bill will pass as it came from the committee. I trust this provision will not be stricken out. I believe it has been heretofore customary to put in just such a provision.

Mr. GRIMES. I think that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio is eminently proper. If you are going to put such a proposition as this into this bill, you will put it in the bill that will be passed next year, and then—

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state to the Senator that we have already ordered new surveys for the coming year, as the Senator will find if he reads the fourth section, so that in the future it will not be necessary. At this time it is necessary.

Mr. GRIMES. If this second section confined its operation to new works, it would be very well, but it does not apply to new works; it applies to all.

Mr. CHANDLER. We intended that it should.

Mr. GRIMES. In that respect I think it is wrong. General Totten, when at the head of the engineer department, sent out his sub-engineers, and they made surveys at various places. Money has been expended on the strength of the recommendations which General Totten made to Congress, and improvements have been partially completed. Now we have a change in the administration of the engineer department; another gentleman is there, equally competent, I suppose; but he entertains different opinions from those entertained by his predecessor. He will have new surveys, at a considerable expense, and change the method of construction. Next year he dies, or is superseded by an order of the President or Secretary of War, and another gentleman comes in as chief engineer, and then you have another change, and so you go on; instead of following out one particular system you have as many systems as you have chief engineers of the department. If the Senator from Michigan will make his proposition so as to say that no money shall be expended upon any new works until the engineer department shall have decided that they ought to be made, and shall have specific plans—

Mr. CHANDLER. This is no new work. There is not a single new work here.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know whether there is any new work or not, but I confess that on reading this bill I have discovered that I am exceedingly defective in my knowledge of geography. There are a great many places that I never heard of before. I would inquire where is the place which is named in the third clause, on page 7, in line one hundred and forty of section one; and I should like to know how the Senator pronounces it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Aux Bees Scies, [O-bis-sa.]

Mr. GRIMES. It is said to be in Michigan, but where is it? Is not that a new work?

Mr. CHANDLER. Hardly a new work. It has been surveyed; there is not much of a harbor there now. It is a harbor of refuge. The same amendment was put on the miscellaneous appropriation bill last year, which was allowed to die.

Mr. GRIMES. It is a new work, though, I take it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The provision for it has been two or three times put on the miscellaneous appropriation bill. This is the exact amount that was estimated by the engineer.

Mr. GRIMES. I have not a word to say against it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have argued the Aux Bees Scies case before the Senate two or three times, and the Senate has every time agreed to the appropriation.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know anything about it. I only alluded to it to get the Senator's pronouncement of the name, and to get myself posted up in regard to the geography of his State.

Mr. CHANDLER. If you want the exact location, it is near Thunder bay, between that and Grand Traverse. I want the Senator to be posted in the geography of the lakes.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is manifestly proper and ought to be adopted. If not, there is going to be no end to the expenditure of money, if you are going to vary these surveys every year as there may happen to be a change in your engineer department.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will give an illustration. On the Thames river a system was adopted of keeping that river clear which was found to be defective. Now, would the Senator go on with a defective system because it had been adopted years ago, or would he adopt the improvements of the age? In my judgment he would adopt the more recent improvement rather than go on with the old plan. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The bill is as perfect now as the two Committees on Commerce could make it. I am willing that any other committee should take charge of it if they can make a better bill. If they can, all right; but I hope the Senate will stand by this.

Mr. WADE. I do not find fault with the general provisions of the bill; but I believe this provision is an unusual one. I have looked at the bill somewhat, and I believe that all the appropriations which it makes are upon the recommendation of the Department founded upon the estimates and surveys of the engineer. Most of these, I am told, are old works where money has heretofore been expended, and where for many years we endeavored to get improvements made but failed, sometimes from one reason and sometimes from another; but they are all, or nearly all, places where large sums of money have been expended, and without the improvement of which the navigation of our rivers and lakes must almost cease. A great many of those harbors are in a condition of dilapidation and going rapidly to decay. Here is a discretion vested in the engineer to go back, and if he sees fit to say that, in his judgment, a work upon which we have expended so much money heretofore, is not proper for the public interest, then he need not expend the appropriation for it; and I do not know how during this season you will do anything with this provision in the bill that no money shall be expended until the engineer has made an examination there and perhaps caused a resurvey. We want something done this season on the lake harbors at all events; and as I said before, I take more interest in them than in any others, because I know more about them. I do not know that they are any more necessary than the others, but it is of the first importance that the work on those harbors should be done just as soon as it can be done.

As for the propriety of expending money upon them, every engineer who has ever been sent out for the last forty years has made the same report, that it was absolutely essential that it should be done. Money has been expended there heretofore. The works are now dilapidated. Why, then, vest the engineer with the discretion to say whether the work is useful or not, and that no money shall be expended until he does say that, and that he may cause a resurvey to be made before anything is to be laid out there? I know very well what will be the result of such a provision. There will be a universal scramble for these appropriations, to find out where the engineer will bestow his favors, and where he will not. These works have all passed under the supervision of the Government. Every Congress for years has passed upon the propriety of almost the whole of them; and why now go back and say to the engineer that he shall go there armed with despotic power to declare whether a work is useful or not, and that he may cause a resurvey and dilly-dally with it another season before a cent shall be laid out upon it? I can see no possible benefit to be derived from such a provision. I know that these lake harbors, and it is well known to all navigators, and well known to all engineers, have been estimated for from year to year and their importance determined; and certainly we want no such resurvey there. We want the money expended under an engineer competent for the business; and having passed upon it already I see no reason for going back or delaying the work any longer than is necessary to pass the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one reason that with me is conclusive why this amendment of my colleague ought to be adopted; and it is this: there are plans for all the existing works, or all the old works of improvement on the lake harbors and on the river harbors with which I am most familiar. Now, if an appropriation is made for an improvement at a particular harbor, and it is left to the engineers—because it is to be decided by the engineers rather than by the Secretary of War—to change the plan, they may fritter away this appropriation in the adoption of some new plan contemplating further expenditures; and as this bill is framed upon the idea that the money expended under it shall complete the improvement of these works, I think it would be very unwise to leave the engineer officers the power to change their plan and to expend this money probably in some new plan which has not yet been submitted to the judgment of Congress. I would much prefer that Congress should take upon itself to determine the amount to be expended at particular places, and adopt the old plans which have been submitted to Congress, rather than authorize the engineers to adopt new plans. We know by experience that the engineer department, under whose supervision this money will be expended, are generally pretty extravagant in their notions. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of my colleague will be adopted.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the Secretary to report the amendment again.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section two, line one, after the word "that" to strike out the following words:

The Secretary of War, before expending any part of the money herein appropriated, shall, where the public interests require it, cause a re-examination and resurvey of the public works hereby appropriated for; and he is hereby authorized to change or modify the present plan, in his opinion the public interest will be materially benefited thereby. And.

So that the section will read:

That the money appropriated by this act shall be so applied as to complete, or make the nearest approximation to completing, the work for which each specific appropriation is made, &c.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to that amendment. It is not material. I did not understand it fully before.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to move a slight amendment in the fifty-fourth line of the first section. The clause now reads: "for improvement of Thames river, Connecticut, $8,000." I move to increase the appropriation $2,000, making it $10,000. That is in harmony with the evidence before the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I desire to move an amendment in line one hundred and nineteen of the first section, on page 6, in the clause making an appropriation for the improvement of Ashtabula harbor. Since the surveys were made, that harbor has become much more important than it was before. There is a railroad extending from the harbor down into the coal and oil region some forty or forty-five miles, and it is nearly ready now to commence business. That railroad will make this one of the most important harbors on the lakes. Ashtabula harbor is at the mouth of Ashtabula creek; the railroad comes in there; and on account of the immense quantities of coal, oil, and everything else that will be likely to meet there, this harbor is more important than it ever was before. The appropriation here is a very small one considering the importance of the work. I will therefore move that there be $10,000 added to it, so as to make it $34,708 82 instead of $24,708 82.

Mr. CHANDLER. The two committees adopted this rule in joint meeting, that they would include no appropriation in this bill which was not recommended by the Department. If we step outside that rule and increase the appropriation in one case, we shall be compelled to increase it in a hundred others. The bill is as near perfect as we could get it, and I hope no additional appropriation will be placed upon the bill. It will endanger the whole. I hope the Senator will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WADE. I know it is important that a larger sum should be expended at this point, but it has not the sanction of the engineers; and as it would be an invasion upon the character of the bill, the committee having followed the recommendations of the engineers all around, notwithstanding my wish that this increase should be made, I will withdraw the amendment, as it might embarrass the bill and lead to other amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee to cooperate with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, if one should be appointed, to consider and report on the propriety of an address before the Congress of the United States commemorative of the life, character, and services of the late Brevet Lieutenant General Winfield Scott.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 621) to regulate and secure the safe-keeping of public money intrusted to disbursing officers of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 69) making an appropriation to enable the President to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to proceed with the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to take up the appropriation bill to-day. I gave notice yesterday that I should do so.

The motion of Mr. FESSENDEN was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION LAW.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the leave of the Senator from Maine, I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 477. It was the special order for to-day at one o'clock. I believe it will occupy no time whatever, and it ought to be passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I yield to that bill with the understanding that it will not occupy time. Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 477) further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will only say that the objection made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] yesterday, and which has been stated in a pamphlet laid upon Senators' tables, is met by the amendments to the bill, so that the parties who complained are entirely satisfied with it.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 213) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read, and the amendments reported by the Committee on Finance will be taken up in their order, as the reading of the bill is proceeded with, unless objected to, as that course will save time.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was in line fifty-one, under the head of "contingent expenses of the Senate," to strike out the word "three" and insert "five," so as to make the appropriation for newspapers $5,000 instead of $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to the following clause among the "contingent expenses of the Senate" in the seventy-sixth line:

For Capitol police, $19,170.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to propose an amendment to that clause, and I may as well offer it as we go along. It is rendered necessary by having more Capitol police than we had at the time the bill was drawn. I move to strike out "$19,170" and to insert "$21,480," and then to add the following proviso:

Provided, That $330 of the appropriation for the Capitol police may be used during the present fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line one hundred and nine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to make an amendment on the fifth page, corresponding to the one made for the Senate. In line one hundred and nine I move to strike out "$19,170" and insert "$21,480: provided that $330 of the appropriation for the Capitol police may be used during the present fiscal year." This comes in under the head of "contingent expenses of the House of Representatives."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That makes it necessary to change the amount of the gross appropriation for the House salaries on page 6, line one hundred and twenty-eight, from "$110,838" to "$113,140."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to the appropriations for compensation of the Superintendent of Public Printing and the clerks and messengers in his office, lines one hundred and sixty-one, one hundred and sixty-two, and one hundred and sixty-three.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to make an amendment there. By another bill there has been a clerk added to that office, and it is necessary to increase the amount. I move on page 8, line one hundred and sixty-two, after the word "office," to strike out "nine" and insert "eleven," and in line one hundred and sixty-three to strike out "seven" and insert "five," so that the clause will read:

For compensation of the Superintendent of Public Printing, and the clerks and messengers in his office, $11,514.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to the appropriations for the Library of Congress. The Committee on Finance proposed, in line one hundred and eighty-four, to strike out "three" and insert "five;" in line one hundred and eighty-five to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve;" and in line one hundred and eighty-six to strike out "eight" and insert "six;" so as to make the clause read:

For compensation of Librarian, five assistant librarians, messenger, and laborers, $12,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in line two hundred and thirteen, after "judgments," to strike out "which may be;" and in line two hundred and sixteen to strike out "three" and insert "five" before "hundred thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

For payment of judgments rendered by the court in favor of claimants, in addition to the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to offer an amendment to come in by way of proviso at the end of line two hundred and seventeen:

Provided, That judgments already rendered may be paid out of this appropriation at any time after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the items for the Department of State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out the increase of twenty per cent. to laborers, which is provided for by the seventh section of the bill, and it will have to be struck out in different places of the bill. There is a section that covers the whole, reported by the committee as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved in lines two hundred and thirty-five and two hundred and thirty-six to strike out:

For increase of twenty per cent. for seven laborers, $340.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was to insert after line two hundred and forty-one these words:

For publishing the laws of the Thirty-Seventh and Thirty-Eighth Congresses in two newspapers in each of the lately insurgent States, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading down to the appropriations for the Northeast Executive Building.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That should be amended for the same reason as I just now stated. In line two hundred and fifty-eight, "four" should be stricken out and "three" inserted; "three" at the end of the line should be "six," and the words "and twenty," in line two hundred and fifty-nine, should be stricken out; so that the clause will read:

For compensation of four watchmen and two laborers of the Northeast Executive Building, $3,600.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those changes will be made in order to make the bill correspond with previous amendments of the Senate.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to the appropriations for the salaries of the Secretary of the Treasury, assistants, clerks, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. An amendment should be made there, in line two hundred and sixty-eight, to strike out "nine" and insert "two," and strike out "and twenty," so as to make the amount $118,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next item, which was the appropriation for the compensation of the First Comptroller, and the clerks, messengers; and laborers in his office.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That should be amended by striking out "eight" and inserting "seven," and striking out "three" and inserting "nine," so as to make the amount appropriated "$17,940" instead of "$48,340."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was in line two hundred and seventy-four, after the word "office" to strike out:

Including three clerks of class four, three clerks of class three, three clerks of class two, three clerks of class one, twelve clerks at an annual salary of $720 each, and one laborer at an annual salary of $720, which are hereby authorized to be appointed.

So that the clause will read:

For compensation of the Second Comptroller, chief clerk, and the clerks, messenger, assistant messenger, and laborer in his office, $134,920.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out, in line two hundred and eighty, "nine," and insert "three," and to strike out "twenty" and insert "eighty," so as to make the sum "$184,380" instead of "$134,920."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the succeeding paragraph, line two hundred and eighty-three, I move to strike out "seven" and insert "two," and to strike out "sixty" and insert "forty," so as to make the amount appropriated for the First Auditor's office "$59,240" instead of "$59,760."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in line two hundred and eighty-seven, after the word "office," to strike out:

Including three clerks of class four, twenty clerks of class three, forty clerks of class two, seventy clerks of class one, one assistant messenger at $840 per annum, and three laborers at $720 per annum each, which are hereby authorized to be appointed.

So that the clause will read:

For compensation of the Second Auditor, chief clerk, and the clerks, messenger, assistant messengers, and laborers in his office, $521,840.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to reduce the sum there from $521,840 to $521,160.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was in line two hundred and ninety-six, after the word "office," to strike out "including five clerks of class four, fifteen clerks of class three, thirty clerks of class two, and fifty clerks of class one;" so that the clause will read:

For compensation of the Third Auditor, chief clerk, and the clerks, messenger, assistant messengers, and laborers in his office, $384,280.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to amend by striking out "$384,280" and inserting instead "$382,080."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In lines three hundred and two and three hundred and three, in the appropriation for the Fourth Auditor's office, I move to strike out "nine" and insert "five," and to strike out "sixty" and insert "forty," so as to make the amount $110,540.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the appropriation for the Fifth Auditor's office, in lines three hundred and five and three hundred and six, the "eight" should be "seven," so as to make the amount $47,840.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line three hundred and eight I move to insert "chief clerk" after "Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line three hundred and twenty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line three hundred and nineteen I move to strike out "one" at the end of the line; in line three hundred and twenty to strike out "five" and insert "eight," and to strike out "twenty" and insert "forty," so as to make the amount appropriated for the office of the Register of the Treasury $90,840 instead of $91,520.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the appropriation for the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, in line three hundred and twenty-three, I move to strike out "five" and to insert "three," and to insert "forty" after "hundred," so as to make the sum $18,340 instead of $18,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the appropriation for the office of the Commissioner of Customs I move to strike out, in line three hundred and twenty-six, "nine" and insert "six," and to strike out "twenty" and insert "forty," so as to make the amount $40,640 instead of $40,920.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the appropriation for the compensation of the clerks, messengers, &c., of the Light-House Board I move, in line three hundred and twenty-eight, to strike out "five" and insert "two," and to strike out "twenty" and insert "forty," so as to make the amount $9,240.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line three hundred and forty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to insert after the word "expenses," in line three hundred and thirty-nine, page 15, the words "including the cost of subscription to such number of copies of the Internal Revenue Record and Customs Journal as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary to supply the revenue officers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After line three hundred and forty, I move to insert:

For office furniture, maps, labor, miscellaneous items, and other contingent expenses for the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line three hundred and sixty-four.

The Committee on Finance proposed to strike out, from line three hundred and forty-eight to line three hundred and sixty-four, the following words:

For compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to clerks in same Department, $160,000: Provided, That the temporary clerks herein provided for may be classified according to the character of their services: And provided further, That so much of the appropriation of $250,000 granted by the act of March 2, 1865, for compensation to temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to clerks in same Department, as remains unexpended shall be divided as follows, to wit: $100 shall be paid to each of the appointees in said Department whose pay amounts to less than $1,200 per annum, and the residue thereof shall be divided per capita to and among all the clerks in said Department of the first and second classes.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

For compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to officers and clerks in the same Department, $160,000: Provided, That the temporary clerks herein provided for may be classified according to the character of their services, and that the Secretary of the Treasury may award such additional compensation as may be in his judgment just, and may be required by the public service. And so much of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, approved March 2, 1865, as forbids the Secretary of the Treasury to award any such additional compensation after the 1st day of July, 1866, is hereby repealed: Provided further, That out of the appropriation of $250,000 made by said act for compensation to temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to clerks in the same Department, there shall be paid to each person therein, appointed by the Secretary as a clerk or counter, who shall have served in such capacity for one year previous to the passage of this act, and whose pay amounts to less than $1,000 per annum, the sum of $100.

Mr. WILSON. I am opposed to this amendment for two reasons. I think it unsound in principle. No Department of the Government ought to be trusted with money in this way. I am opposed to it because I do not choose to trust the present officer at the head of the Treasury with such powers. This is no time, in the present shifting condition of affairs, to trust any man in any of these Departments with such discretionary powers. If it is necessary to increase the salaries of the officers in the Treasury Department—and it may be—I think we should fix the salaries by law. The Secretary of the Treasury should not have this power, to be exercised according to his discretion. It cannot but tend to favoritism. It cannot operate justly. It tends to make the men employed anything but independent men. It encourages a spirit of flunkeyism on the one hand, and a feeling on the other that there is power to reward men or punish them according to the discretion of the individual. I think the principle unsound, and it ought never to be admitted in the Government at all, and especially not in this Department at this time. I believe that what has already been done in this direction has worked most disastrously, and has created a feeling of dissatisfaction general in the Department.

It may be that we ought to have an increase of the compensation of the higher officers. I am willing to vote for that increase if it be necessary. But I cannot vote for this amendment, and I hope the Senate will not sanction this policy. I hope the Senate will not sanction what I deem to be an unsound principle, and will not at this time, in the present condition of the country, trust the Secretary of the Treasury with this discretionary power, this power to reward at his pleasure; to take $100,000 and distribute it among his employes according to his will and pleasure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can only say with regard to this matter, that if the principle be an unsound one, it may be imputed in the first place to the first Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Lincoln's Administration and to his successor. Mr. McCulloch, the present Secretary of the Treasury, is not responsible for it in any way whatever except for the continuation of it. I hope that in settling this question the Senate will not be governed by the opinions which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts may happen to entertain of the present Secretary of the Treasury. I know that politically he is not acceptable to the Senator and perhaps to others; but in the administration of the affairs of his Department I have every reason to believe that he has conducted the interior arrangements of the Department and everything connected with it very honorably, properly, and honestly, and very ably. There is no objection on that account. So long as he is Secretary of the Treasury he must be trusted with the powers necessary to carry on the Treasury. There is no question about that.

This is not a new provision. The Senator probably has not looked at these bills. His attention has been called to this matter by some dissatisfied clerk or clerks in the Department who have made some disturbance about it, and, without understanding the case, he makes the remarks that we have just heard.

In the first place, such is the business of the Department that it is absolutely necessary to employ a good many temporary clerks, and a fund has been set aside regularly for several years, first on the recommendation of Mr. Chase, the first Secretary under Mr. Lincoln, of $200,000 for that purpose; and it has been very well applied.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to ask the Senator a question right there. It is whether, in the present condition of affairs, it is necessary to have this power to employ temporary clerks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Quite necessary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have understood that recently quite a number of clerks have been discharged from the Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is quite as necessary to have this power as it ever was, and, indeed, more so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Can we not fix the number of clerks by law, so as to avoid the necessity of appointing temporary clerks?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps we might fix the number by law, but we should have to fix it at so large a figure that probably it would cost us more than the employment of temporary clerks.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I see it stated in the newspapers that they are discharging clerks constantly, and that they have more force than they need. That has been stated within a few days.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Sometimes when business does not press so much they discharge to save money, and at other times they employ again. If anybody wants the Department to keep a number of men there for months when they are not needed, fix the number by law; but then we should have to pay them all the time. The idea has been to employ temporary clerks as they might be needed. Sometimes business presses more than at others. Again, the principal reason for those discharges is that experience shows some clerks to be useless; they do not answer the purpose; they do not do their duty and then they are discharged, and afterward, when business presses, their places are filled up again. Let me tell the Senator that from my experience in the Department I am prepared to say to him that he need not base any action of his—he cannot with any safety—on what he sees in the newspapers. The newspapers do not know anything about it; they say anything that comes in their heads.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I supposed they might state a fact as to clerks being discharged.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, yes; but they state anything that comes in their heads about the Departments as well as about us. The Senator's experience of newspaper remarks, I think, should satisfy him that it is quite as well to omit paying any attention to them. I came to that conclusion long ago. If they would examine and be sure of their facts, and understand them before they made their statements, it would save a great deal of difficulty and trouble. But they take, as Senators do, floating rumors about what they hear, and they make articles upon them as Senators make speeches upon them, without knowing really what they are talking about in many cases.

The condition of business in the Department, as I have said, requires that there should be power to appoint temporary clerks. When I was in the Department I found another difficulty which required a remedy. The business of the Department became very much dependent upon a certain class of clerks, and those generally the ablest and most important men in the Department. It became dependent upon them, and they could not be dispensed with in point of fact. It became necessary, therefore, to provide some way in which they could be kept, because banks were being instituted and all sorts of business corporations all over the country, and looking out for accomplished men, men who could conduct their affairs. They came here and they took a great many men out of the Treasury Department and would have taken a great many more but for the steps that were taken to retain them. It became necessary, in order to conduct the business of the Department, that there should be power to raise the salaries of a certain class, to increase the pay of a certain class of clerks. Everybody was petitioning for an increase of salary. On examining into the matter I became satisfied that there was no necessity for increasing the salary of the largest number of the clerks; that it would not do; that the first-class clerks and most of the second-class clerks received as much pay as they ought to receive. To be sure, some of them who had families could not live very well upon their salaries; but you cannot make distinctions between clerks and pay those who have families more than those who have not. They are divided into classes, and perform the same duties. You can get any number of them. The applications are innumerable. You can get any number that you please at any time, and for the great mass of them the pay is high enough. Consequently it would not do to increase the pay all round; there is no necessity for it, and it would involve an enormous expense.

Under those circumstances, and to obviate that difficulty, I drew, with my own hand, the amendment that I wanted passed to enable me to get along in the office and keep the services of those men who must be kept in order to do the business. Into the appropriation, which Congress had been in the habit of making for the employment of temporary clerks, I inserted a provision that in cases where the Secretary deemed the public service to require it, he should have the power to increase the pay of clerks. I drew it with that object, to increase the pay of those men who were absolutely essential to transact the business of the office, who were resigning at the rate of six or seven a week, sometimes, because they could get very much larger pay elsewhere. The cases were numerous where a man receiving $1,800 or $2,000 was offered $3,000, and sometimes more, to become cashier of a bank, or something of that description; and there was great danger that we should lose many competent men, especially in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and in the office of the Treasurer, where you must have trustworthy and able men. I therefore had that clause inserted, with a view to remedy the difficulty without unnecessarily increasing the expenses of the Department.

The present Secretary of the Treasury was then Comptroller of the Currency. He understood it perfectly; and when, after the appropriation was made according to my recommendation, he went into the office of Secretary of the Treasury, he applied the money precisely as I intended it should be applied and as he understood it ought to be applied, a certain portion of it, just as little as he could possibly get along with, to the men whose services were absolutely necessary. All at once an outcry was raised by the lower classes of clerks, who received all that it was intended they should receive, that this money, instead of being given to those who received the least, was used to swell the salaries of those who received the most. They got up a noise about it; and people did not understand it; it was not understood outside; nobody took pains to inquire of the Secretary of the Treasury what was meant. Articles were written in the newspapers on the subject, and a great noise was made. The House of Representatives, I see, when they passed this bill, in the clause which the Committee on Finance have moved to strike out, went to work, yielding to that outcry, thinking they were doing justice, and appropriated a certain sum out of this money to those who received not over $1,200 a year and giving the balance to the first-class clerks and to the second-class clerks. The increase has been given in a great many cases to the fourth-class clerks, as it was intended it should be, and to some of the third-class clerks; but as this section came from the House of Representatives it would leave out the third-class clerks and give something additional to the first and second-class, which it was really intended should not be increased at all.

I have drawn this amendment precisely to cover the ideas under which the original provision was drawn. The sum which I have put in here is not so large as the Secretary of the Treasury or those who are more conversant with the business of the Treasury Department than he is—because some of the subordinate officers are necessarily so—think will absolutely be required; but I think they can get along with it. If this amendment is not made, the result will be that there will be no power to retain the services of men who must be retained in order to carry on the business of the Department; and it is too late in the session now to sit down and revise the whole arrangements of the Department and classify the clerks anew. I think it would not be wise, and it would lead to a large increase of expenses, and especially for those very classes which are already sufficiently provided for. I think the storm for getting men in will be over before long; and if we get back to the specie basis, as I think we shall in the process of time, the old salaries will probably be enough for all the classes of clerks. This is a temporary expedient, resorted to only during the existing state of things and to save the necessity of passing a law which shall fix increased rates of salaries, which we shall find it exceedingly difficult to get rid of at a time when we may desire to do so, because it is always hard to strike down; it is much easier to strike up.

I have now given an exposition of the whole matter. I think that the view which has been taken by my honorable friend from Massachusetts is founded in misapprehension and error, and that we should be doing great disservice to the Department in refusing to make this appropriation.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. My attention has been called to this section, not precisely upon the point which the Senator from Massachusetts has raised, but another. It appears that in 1865 there was an appropriation of $250,000 for the employment of temporary clerks and increasing the pay of the permanent clerks in the Treasury Department, and a portion of that money remains unexpended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. And the Senate committee have changed to some extent the distribution of the unexpended sum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. According to the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, of that unexpended sum $100 is proposed to be given to each appointee whose salary is less than $1,200, and the remainder is to be divided per capita among the clerks of the first and second classes. As amended by our committee, from that unexpended balance there is a sum of $100 given to each clerk or counter whose salary is less than $1,000, which operates in substance the same as the House section thus far, I think; but nothing is done with any remainder that there may be of that unexpended balance. Now, I have been spoken to, as other Senators have been, by disappointed clerks, who insist that it is but reasonable and fair, that after giving the $100 to those who receive less than $1,000, or less than $1,200, it would be but fair to allow whatever balance there may be to be distributed among the clerks of the first and second classes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator can judge for himself. Because we give $100 to those who receive only $720, it is therefore fair to give it to those who receive $1,200 and $1,400. That is the argument.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. There are a good many of those receiving $1,200 and $1,400 who are heads of families, who have a wife and children dependent upon them. Those who are receiving less than $1,000, I apprehend, are very few of them in that position.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Many of them are.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. As the bill came from the House of Representatives it gives to those persons receiving less than $1,000 just what the amendment gives them, but the amendment then cuts off the unexpended balance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It leaves that in the hands of the Secretary to be appropriated to the general purposes of the provision.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think it would be better to adopt the House plan, and let this small sum—it is but a pittance anyhow—go among those who have a hard time to get along.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This "small sum" is about $60,000. If the Senator thinks it is better to give away $60,000 to these clerks, when you can get a thousand of them at any moment just as good as these are, be it so.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I suppose you can; and yet I have heard a great deal said, and there is a great deal of truth in what is said, about giving more compensation to the higher class of clerks; but I know men to-day in these Departments receiving $1,800 who can do and have the ability to do the work of men who receive $3,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think he is. I think

I know a great deal more about it than he does; I have been in the Departments.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is very possible; and yet I may know more about individual clerks upon low salaries than the Senator does. It does not follow that the man who receives the highest compensation is the best officer. I think I know men from my own State receiving a salary of $1,800 well qualified to discharge the duties of men who receive a salary of $3,000. I hope this amendment will not be adopted, in so far, at least, as it prevents the distribution of the excess of this appropriated sum of money among these inferior clerks. Congress has already appropriated a sum of money, $250,000. A portion of it has been spent in paying, properly enough—I have no fault to find with that—additional compensation to the superior clerks; but a portion is unexpended, and it is now proposed to give $100 each to those who receive the least. Then I hope that whatever unexpended balance there may be will be divided among those who stand next—those receiving $1,200 and $1,400.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a mere proposition to give away $60,000 out of the public Treasury to men not in the slightest degree entitled to it, and who do not earn it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. How does it differ from the proposition to give $100 apiece to those who do not receive $1,000? Can you not get enough to fill their places?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is for the general reason that they do earn more, and ought to have it, and their pay is much less.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understood the Senator, however, to say that you can get hundreds of people to take the places of clerks receiving $1,200, and therefore you ought not to give them more than $1,200. Is it not true that you can get hundreds to take the places of those who are receiving less than $1,000 now?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose you might.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have been applied to almost every day since I have been here for aid to get people into these positions; and if the argument holds good in the one case, it does in the other. If there is no occasion for giving $100 more to a man receiving $1,200 because you can get another person to take his place, there is no use giving $100 more to a person receiving $900 because you may get another to take his or her place.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The logic of that is that because you bring one up to $820 you should bring the other up to $1,300.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The reason the Senator will not give $100 additional to those who receive $1,200 is that so many more can be got to fill their places. Does not the argument hold good in the other case?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a mere waste of money, and the whole thing arises from a misapprehension of the object of the appropriation.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I hope the amendment will not be adopted, or, if it is, that the provision making additional compensation to these inferior clerks will be stricken out altogether.

Mr. CRESWELL. My objection to this amendment of the committee is different, somewhat, from those already presented. It seems to me that the amendment of the Committee on Finance transcends, in one respect, the entire scope of the original proposition as it came from the House of Representatives. The House provision applied solely to clerks of various grades, but the provision of the Senate amendment not only applies to clerks, but it applies to officers and clerks, in the Treasury Department; so that under this provision we are vesting a discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury to raise the salary of every officer of that Department, no matter what his grade, from Assistant Secretary down. That is a discretion which I am unwilling to vest in him; and I think certainly, as regards the officers of the Treasury Department, there is sufficient knowledge of the services they render and of the capacity and labor required of the various persons who fill those stations to enable the Congress of the United States to fix their salaries properly. I think it is putting this whole matter at sea, and investing entirely too large a discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We did precisely the same thing last year.

Mr. CRESWELL. The phraseology seems to be different.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was in another section and another provision in last year's bill.

Mr. CRESWELL. The fact that it was done last year, if it was done, does not get rid of the objection.

Mr. GRIMES. We had not the same Secretary then.

Mr. CRESWELL. That is one point, too.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I regretted to hear the Senator from Massachusetts express a want of confidence, in regard to so small a matter as this, in the Secretary of the Treasury. When this same power was given to the Secretary of the Treasury a year ago, I do not recollect to have heard that Senator express any want of confidence in its exercise by the Secretary. Of course we all know he would not have been authorized or justified in the expression of any want of confidence; and in regard to the present Secretary, I think he is not authorized in it by anything that has occurred in his management of the Treasury Department. He is a citizen of the State from which I come, and I am proud of his reputation and ability as a manager of the finances of the country. He came to that Department with a high reputation, and I think he has added very largely to that reputation. If the Senator is influenced in his judgment by any apparent differences of political opinion between him and the Secretary of the Treasury, then I say, for that reason alone, in these times, when we desire to cultivate the public credit and to establish confidence in all the affairs of the Treasury Department, the Senator is not authorized, in my judgment, merely because of a little difference of political opinion, to express a want of confidence. If he bases his opinion upon the management of that Department by that distinguished citizen, then I think the facts do not justify the expression which he has made to the Senate this morning. Now, sir, if we intrust to the Secretary of the Treasury the management of hundreds of millions of dollars, which we do every year, shall we hesitate to give him the power to distribute among the worthy men of his Department a small sum of money, according to merit, and in such a way as to secure efficient support in his Department? That branch of the subject has been so satisfactorily treated by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that I shall add nothing to what he has said.

Mr. HOWE. I am going to vote against this amendment, and I want to say that that vote does not necessarily imply any want of confidence in the administrative ability or the personal integrity of the present Secretary of the Treasury. I never saw the Secretary of the Treasury and I never saw the head of any other Department that I would agree, or ever did agree, to put this sum of money in the hands of to be distributed arbitrarily. I have always opposed the provisions, and I think I shall always oppose every provision of the kind. If it be so that we have a Secretary of the Treasury who cannot tell us what amount of service he wants and what kind of service he wants, and cannot inform us what such service as that brings in New York or Boston, in banks or custom-houses or in other places where like services are employed, we had better abandon the idea of governing the country at all and having any Treasury Department. I insist upon it that the Secretary of the Treasury does know, or ought to know, just how many employes he wants of these different kinds and grades, and the Legislature ought to know it, and we ought to be willing, and for one I am willing, that the Government should pay just as much for services of this kind when employed by the Government as they can get elsewhere. I do not believe that private parties prosecuting private business ought to outbid the Government of the United States for a given kind of service, and I am not willing that it should be done. When we know what is wanted, I am willing to fix the pay high enough to command the best kind of service where the best kind of service is wanted; but I am not willing, as it seems to me, to undermine the whole theory upon which legislation is based, and to put a gross sum in the hands of any man to be distributed according to his pleasure. I do not know what the Secretary of the Treasury himself says or asks about this thing, but it seems to me that it cannot be a favor to him, but on the contrary, a great disfavor to him. I do not know what sum would induce me to undertake the disbursement of such an amount. If you were to make it three times this amount, I have no doubt it would all be disbursed and would all be demanded of the Secretary. Men would be forced upon him or their claims would be forced upon him for an increase of their salaries that he could not resist, and the whole of it would go.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Wisconsin says that he has no doubt all this amount will be disbursed, even if it were three times as great as it is. The answer to that is simply that the appropriation last year was $250,000, and all that was expended was $130,000.

Mr. HOWE. That does rather upset my theory, but it is not so flat a contradiction of it as it would be if they were not here asking for an additional appropriation on the same account.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have got another year to provide for now. One hundred dollars is to go to each of those receiving less than one thousand dollars per annum; and that will take about sixty thousand dollars, leaving about sixty or seventy thousand dollars.

Mr. HOWE. They still retain the unexpended appropriation of last year and ask for an additional appropriation to that. I do not understand why they ought not to be content with that already made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will make the Senator understand, if I can, if he will allow me to explain.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the first place, the appropriation made last year was for last year. The appropriation proposed to be made now is for the year to come. We cannot apply the money that was appropriated for the last year in the year to come. We have left about one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. Sixty thousand dollars of that will be taken up by the clause which gives $100 additional to each employe who receives less than one thousand dollars per annum, leaving about sixty thousand dollars. The result is to make the expenditure a little over two hundred thousand dollars instead of $250,000, which was the appropriation made last year. I was informed in the Department by the clerk who makes these calculations—because they do not come immediately from the Secretary—that he thought the appropriation ought to be $200,000 instead of $160,000. I told him that they must try to get along with $160,000.

An objection is made to putting into the hands of the Secretary the power of raising the salaries. It is to avoid what will be necessarily an expenditure that it is put precisely in this way. If you raise the salaries, they are fixed, and they will be fixed when we come to have a different kind of currency in a year or two from what we have now. I thought, when I was Secretary, and the present Secretary is of the same opinion, that it is more economical to meet the extra expenses for two or three years by this kind of appropriation than to make a general increase of salaries, on account of the difficulty that would occur if we were to attempt to reduce them afterward. Gentlemen would be applied to by clerks precisely as they applied to my friend from Iowa [Mr. Kirkwood] who argued the question just now. Clerks from a particular State will get their Senators and Representatives interested in their own particular cases and those cases will affect very nearly the opinion with regard to all, and then we shall have adopted a general principle of a large expenditure, because each of us here has somebody from our State instead of leaving them to their chances of advancement and their ability to render service. That is simply the argument of it.

Mr. HOWARD. It is very possible that there may be a necessity for an appropriation for additional clerks and other officers in the Treasury Department; to what exact extent I do not know. The objection that I have to the amendment now before us is, that it gives the Secretary of the Treasury a very broad discretionary authority to make distinctions and discriminations among the additional clerks who may be by him employed, and who are to be paid out of this appropriation. Does it not open the door to a system of favoritism and electioneering among the clerks which is very obnoxious? That is my idea.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. HOWARD. I should really like to have a word of explanation upon that subject from the honorable Senator from Maine. It seems to me that this feature is objectionable.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There has heretofore been a proviso inserted that in employing additional clerks they should all be of the first class and receive $1,200. That has been found to work very badly. It does not make any electioneering in the Department, but outside of the Department, to bring them in. Now, you need different classes of men. Sometimes a man whom you want very much and whose services would be valuable, you cannot get for $1,200, and the business that you want him to do is such that he ought to receive more than $1,200 for it. For that reason the limitation that these temporary clerks shall be $1,200 clerks has been stricken out in this amendment, because it would compel the appointment of men who cannot render the service required. My idea is that it is not worth while, with regard to a public officer, to take it for granted that he will do everything badly. If you have a public officer of high station you may just as well conclude, because I believe that is the most anxious desire of every head of a Department, that he will make his Department as efficient as he can and do the business as well as he can and with as little expense as possible, and that he can be safely trusted. My opinion is that instead of wasting this money and expending it too liberally, he will rather expend it too niggardly under all the circumstances, for fear that he might be blamed with regard to it. That has been the result, and always will be, because the objections that might possibly be made will always make the head of the Department very careful on that point.

Mr. HOWARD. I am far from indulging the presumption that every officer in that or any other Department will abuse the authority that we bestow upon him. I am more charitable than that. But still, with reference to the present Secretary of the Treasury, it cannot be forgotten, and I presume it is not forgotten—certainly it ought not to be forgotten—that he has very recently taken a position in party politics which is very extraordinary, to say the least. In a public speech not long since, speaking in reference to a measure then pending before Congress for the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, he so far forgot the dignity of the position which he holds, and the measure of respect which, if it be not due to Congress, ought always to be observed toward Congress, as to say that most of us were but a set of Constitution tinkers, an expression which was unworthy, not perhaps of him, but of the position which he occupies, indicating that he had placed himself in a state of antagonism with what then appeared to be the prevailing sentiment of Congress upon a most important public measure.

Now, sir, if it is his determination to continue in this attitude of antagonism and of contempt toward the bodies from which he derives not only his office but his bread, I do not feel disposed to trust him with the exercise of so broad a discretionary power in the selection and payment of his clerks as this amendment confers upon him. I do not think it prudent exactly to say to him, "You have full authority to reward a partisan of your own by a high salary, whatever may be his qualifications as a clerk, and to reject other applicants or to give them however small a pittance they may be contented with." I would far prefer to lay down some rigid rule of law by which the clerk, whoever he may be, shall know for a certainty, by act of Congress, how much he is to receive for his services, and not to make him dependent upon the good will or the whim of the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other public officer. It may not be possible at this moment to secure such a provision; but I throw out these ideas as the ground of my opposition to the amendment in its present form.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have no desire to repeat what I have said already on this subject. I only rise for the purpose of replying to one observation made by the Senator from Maine. I have never had any conversation with people whom I represent with reference to this matter. I know some gentlemen who receive but small salaries as clerks, who, in my judgment, are competent to perform the duties of those who receive higher salaries; but I have had no conversation with any one in reference to this matter.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think this question should be treated upon its merits, without any regard to the imputation of motives to anybody why they approve or disapprove of it. I certainly do not approve of the course which the Secretary of the Treasury has thought proper to adopt in speaking of Congress. I think it is always best to speak respectfully of the coordinate departments of the Government, and that nothing is gained by indulging in abuse of those that we cannot agree with. But the form of this appropriation, it strikes me, is very objectionable. It really puts it in the hands of the head of the Department to fix the salaries of these clerks. I put in his control some two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, I believe, last year, and $100,000, I think, by this bill, which he is to distribute in the employment of temporary clerks, and in additional compensation to such clerks as he thinks proper. I should not think that the Secretary would want to be invested with such a power. It must be very harassing and embarrassing, I should think, to him, to have to make this distinction.

But the objection which I have to it is that it leaves a discretionary power, which, while it may induce zeal and greater activity on the part of the clerks, it seems to me has a tendency to make them more dependent upon the head of the Department. I dislike above all things to see this dependence of one man upon another any more than it can be possibly helped in the necessary discipline to be observed in the Departments. I would not have the subordinate clerks to depend upon the head of the Department for the amount of their salary; and certainly it is calculated to lead to abuse. I will not undertake to say that the present Secretary of the Treasury, or any Secretary of the Treasury would abuse it; but it is a part of the Lord's Prayer, "lead us not into temptation." If they are not placed in this position, they certainly will make no misapplication of any such fund. It does not seem to me that there is any necessity for it. I have not looked into the statutes, but I rather think it will be found that it has grown up within the last three or four years.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has grown up from the necessity of the case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I am right. It has grown up within the last three or four years. We are through the war now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will tell the Senator, however, that long before the war took place there was a standing appropriation of $25,000 for this very purpose of making additional compensation to clerks who rendered additional service.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does seem to me it involves a very bad principle. I do not propose to take up time further than to state what seems to me to be an objection to this species of legislation, and I hope the Senate will not concur in the proposition.

There is also another objection that may be stated. It leads to a great deal of dissatisfaction among the clerks themselves. They are all claiming it, and one set of clerks think, as I am told, that they have been overlooked, while others, they charge, are favorites of the particular Secretary in case they receive any portion of this money; and they become dissatisfied; though, I will say to the Senator from Maine, that no one in any of the Departments has ever said a word to me on the subject. What I say is irrespective of any complaints from anybody. I have understood, and understood it here to-day, that there are complaints. I think, perhaps, I have heard of them before; but I am not aware that any clerk in any Department every spoke to me in reference to the distribution of this fund.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I mean only to state—the Senate, of course, will do what it pleases about it—that if you strike out this appropriation as the Senator proposes, the Department cannot get along. It will be undoubtedly embarrassed, and they cannot possibly do the work of the Department.

Mr. WILSON. I desire, before this debate closes, to say a word in reply to the remarks made by the Senator from Indiana. Among the objections that I made to this amendment was, that I did not choose, in the present state of affairs, to give this discretionary power to the Secretary of the Treasury. I cast no imputation upon his motives or his conduct; but, sir, I must be permitted to say, as that Senator has thought it to be his duty to call the attention of the Senate to my remarks, that there are a great many things in the avowals and acts of the Secretary of the Treasury that have not met the approval of large masses of men in this country. I think that no discretionary power should be intrusted to him, or to any other of these Secretaries, that can be avoided, now that we have passed through the crisis of the war, and we have time enough to frame the proper laws and to hold all the Departments responsible for their administration.

It is well known that we have a very important law upon the statute-book—the oath of office. It is a well-known fact that the Secretary of the Treasury persistently for months, and in spite of the earnest remonstrances of the leading men of this country, continued to violate the law of the land, and to defend his violation of the law of the land when remonstrated with. He assumed to understand the public judgment of the country better than those who reminded him of his duty to obey the law, and told us that Congress would repeal the law; that there would be a majority in Congress to sustain the views that he entertained. Events have shown that he knew but little of the public sentiment of Congress or of the country. After a struggle, after months of violation of law, he comes here with a bill and asks us to pass an act to pay these persons whom he has unlawfully put into office, because he now intends to put them out and to obey the law.

I think that a public officer acting as he has acted in regard to that matter ought not to have discretionary powers thrust upon him. I have no disposition to criticise any of his public acts. There are those in the country who do. I have here now a letter from one of the most eminent merchants in New York in which he says:

"Since January, 1866, the Secretary of the Treasury has sold in New York some seventy million dollars gold; and the amount of the commissions paid to

P. M. Myers, a broker in Wall street, and a nephew of the Secretary, cannot be less than about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. This is all wrong; the Government has all the machinery in motion here in its Assistant Treasurer, Mr. Van Dyck, for selling gold without one dollar for commission. The gold has to be counted out over the counter of the Assistant Treasurer and paid for there, and the sales can be made at the counter of the sub-Treasury much better than by the nephew of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"This P. M. Myers is a purchaser for the Secretary of the Treasury of such Government securities as he wishes to purchase, and there must be a commission paid for this."

I believe that the present Secretary of the Treasury, after the position he has taken, should be held, as other public officers should be held, to a strict accountability to the laws; that the law ought to be clear and definite. The effect of it will be to create ill-will and complaint in the Department. I have heard over and over again since this provision was first passed of complaints made in regard to it, and it cannot be otherwise. I think it tends to favoritism on the one hand, and on the other to a subserviency that ought not to exist. I think these clerks ought to have their defined salaries.

There is no disguising another matter, and I think we have a right to meet it, and for one, I choose to do it now, here and everywhere, although I have ceased to have any anxieties about the result, and I do not think anybody now has much doubt about the result in the country. There is no man living in America who began so early, who has been so dogmatic, domineering, and defiant in regard to the best and holiest sentiments of the mass of the men who brought this Administration into power as the Secretary of the Treasury. He has gone beyond any other public man in maintaining a policy that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the men who brought the Administration into power always have opposed, and are opposed to to-day. As was said a moment ago by the Senator from Michigan, when others were retreating, when there were signs from various quarters of coming down, and acknowledging that there was a Congress of the United States, and a people and Congress together, that there was a power in the country, the Secretary of the Treasury rose here in this city, and in a speech which I will not characterize, assailed the Congress of the United States. Under such circumstances, I, for one, do not choose to put uncalled-for discretionary powers in such an officer's hands to use to build up a class of Department clerks who get together and denounce Congress for its acts. I do not want to encourage and reward that set of men. Let the Secretary of the Treasury act under authority of law well defined; and let every man that fills an office under him, whether he be a friend or foe, have his fixed salary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are two things that I dislike very much, although perhaps it is very bad taste in me to dislike them. One is to seek the occasion of a mere matter of business to make political speeches, dragging politics into every bill that affords an opportunity to make a political speech upon. It interrupts the ordinary course of business, creates bad feeling, and is, allow me to say, in excessively bad taste. If it leads to any conclusion whatever, it is that politics is the only subject upon which gentlemen feel at home and can make a speech, and not upon matters of business.

Another thing that I dislike, although that is a matter of taste and Senators can do as they please, is assailing absent men who are not here to speak for themselves and defend themselves. The habit in Congress of abusing different individuals, not for particular acts when those acts are under discussion, but upon matters of business, whenever a chance can be got to do it, I think is in bad taste. I think, moreover, that it has another effect, and that is to injure ourselves exceedingly. The people of this country are a very sensible people, taking them as a whole, and I have the impression that they do not look upon that kind of way of doing business as the most beneficial or the most becoming in men who are presumed to know how to do it; but as I said before, that is a matter of taste and opinion upon which we may well differ.

Now, sir, as the Secretary of the Treasury is not here to speak for himself, and the Senator from Massachusetts has seen fit to comment upon him with some severity, I wish to say a word on the other side. I do not believe that at the present day anybody will suspect me particularly of being in favor of the President's policy, so called. I have defined my position on that subject quite as distinctly as anybody else; but I do not want to talk about it on an appropriation bill. I think we have had quite enough occasions during this session upon which we could discuss all those questions, and that if we are to bring them up on appropriation bills and other business matters during the residue of the session, gentlemen will not be likely to get away by the middle of July, because we shall have it over and over again upon the different subjects that come up. I know that the present Secretary of the Treasury does not at present stand in that relation to Congress which I should like to have him occupy; but I really believe that much of the fault that is found with him as Secretary of the Treasury nothing would have been said about and no complaints made about if it had not been that he did not agree with the majority of Congress upon political subjects. It always happens that when a gentleman who is at the head of a Department or in any other public position antagonizes with any party, majority or minority, they criticize his acts with a feeling and in a manner that they would not do if he was their political friend; and therefore I think such discussions in Congress, if they are not called for, are exceedingly unprofitable.

I think the Secretary of the Treasury endeavors to perform his duty as Secretary of the Treasury honestly and faithfully. I did not agree with him in the speech that he made in response to a set of gentlemen who called upon him the other evening to draw him out. I think that speech was in bad taste, and an unfortunate one, a portion of it. But I think that the nature of the speech was rather due to the fact that he was not accustomed to public speaking, and did not know where he was going when he began exactly, than to any other cause.

Mr. GRIMES. It was written out and committed to memory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the Senator's opinion, not mine.

Mr. GRIMES. It is my opinion founded on the fact that I was present at the time, and heard him recall sentences just as a man always does when he is attempting to recite a speech that he has written out beforehand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why, sir, I recall sentences when I am speaking, although I never write speeches; and so does the Senator from Iowa, and every other Senator present.

Mr. GRIMES. That was altogether a different matter.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is only proving the kind of jaundiced eye through which, or by the help of which, the honorable Senator looks at everything the Secretary of the Treasury does. That is the amount of it. Now, treat every man fairly. I do not agree with the Secretary about that speech; I think it was in very bad taste, but I do not hold him responsible for any design to insult Congress. Why, sir, if he insulted anybody he insulted me. If we were all "tinkers" I have been placed in a position where I was considerable of a tinker.

Several SENATORS. The chief.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The chief tinker, if you please. I did not think of taking any personal offense. I do not believe that the Secretary of the Treasury meant to insult me or offend me, or anybody else, and I am not going to abuse him for that reason, because if I did I should be guilty of very bad taste myself.

Now, sir, with regard to the other charge that the honorable Senator made, that the Secretary appointed men to office who could not take the oath, I know how that was brought about. He believed, and honestly believed, and others believed with him, and to this day I am very much of the same opinion myself, (although I should not have taken the course he did, because I think that a man is responsible to the law, and he must obey the law,) that in order to collect the revenue, he must take the course he did; and it was not done by himself of his own motion and alone. I do not believe he is any more responsible for it than many others, good and patriotic men, who advised him to that course. It was a state of things that came up owing to the settlement of our controversies. It was necessary to collect the revenue. We must have officers. The Secretary believed that under the circumstances the best thing that he could do was to appoint these men, with the perfect understanding that unless his act in doing so was confirmed, they were not to be paid, according to the law; to let them collect the revenue and let Congress settle the question; and he believed Congress would settle it in a particular way, and that is, authorize, and they will authorize, the payment of these men, although they will not repeal the law. It is not proved which is right on that subject of the revenue, whether Congress is right, or the Secretary. That remains to be proved. But still, that being the law of the land—men act differently—I should have let the revenue go, and say, "There is the law, and I cannot help it."

Mr. JOHNSON. I doubt that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I should; I might, and I might not. But I do not think a man is to be visited with much indignation for an error of judgment of that description. Many others would have acted as he did; and although I might not have done the same thing, I never felt like imputing fault to the Secretary about it. Now that Congress has considered the subject, and settled it, the matter is at an end. How it will eventuate with regard to the collection of the revenue in that country remains to be seen; I do not know.

That the Secretary supports the President in his policy is true. Therein he and I differ; and therein I differ with the President himself; but we cannot remove the Secretary, and why should we be continually bringing up that fact in a matter of business? We are here to provide for the administration of the Department. The question is, how it can be best administered; and gentlemen, in discussing the question how it can be best administered, talk about the Secretary. Why, sir, that has nothing to do with the question, if the Secretary is a man who tries honestly to manage the affairs of his Department successfully and well and fairly; and that I really believe the present Secretary does. That he may make mistakes would be true of any other man. I know I made some when I was there; but nobody found it out and talked about it, except the Democrats, and they said I was mistaken from beginning to end. I did not care a sixpence what they said, and do not to this day; but I knew I made some mistakes, and those they did find out.

Mr. JOHNSON. You never told them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not tell them. I got along with them just as well as I could. Any man would do so necessarily. But with regard to the honest intentions of the present Secretary of the Treasury to administer his Department fairly, faithfully, and for the good of the country, so far as he is able to do so, I have no manner of doubt whatever; and I stand here to say so in spite of the fact that he supports the President's policy and I do not; and I do not mean, having those opinions with regard to him, to have what I consider an injustice done to him in that particular.

Now, sir, leaving that subject, and hoping that politics will not again come into the appropriation bills, (for my personal relations with the Secretary are such as compel me to bear testimony to his worth when I hear him assailed thus publicly,) let us come to the question that is before the Senate. The present Secretary of the Treasury is in no degree responsible for it. If it is a bad principle, I am, personally, more responsible than any other man; for although my predecessor did ask and receive, without a word of objection from anybody, because it was proper and necessary, a sum of money to employ extra clerks and to increase the compensation of others—I do not know whether that was in it or not; the first was, at any rate—and it was continued from year to year, this precise provision that now exists, not in the same words however, but the substance of the provision I drew with my own hand at the Treasury Department, and sent to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CONNESS. It was determined, if the Senator will permit me, in the Committee on Finance, before the honorable Senator was Secretary of the Treasury. The committee sustained that course after a full consideration. They knew that the salaries of the clerks in all the Departments could not be raised, and they also knew, upon investigation, that the salaries of some of them must be raised, and they adopted that plan.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the whole of the matter from beginning to end.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to remind the Senator that he is not entirely correct in saying that there was no objection to the proposition. There was an objection made in committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I never heard it.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator has forgotten it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I may have forgotten it.

Mr. CONNESS. The objection did not obtain.

Mr. HOWE. I remember that very well, but the objection was made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If my friend from Wisconsin did not make an objection in that case, I will say it was a wonderful thing, for I never knew a question that he did not object to anyhow. [Laughter.] It would be an exception to his general rule.

Now, the simple fact is, that the Treasury cannot get along without something of this sort being done. With the present force of the Treasury, as organized, the business cannot be done. The reason why no new organization was made and salaries increased was simply because by doing so we should commit ourselves to an increase that would cost us more money than we ought to pay. It would necessarily lead to a large expenditure of money that might be saved, and we were anxious to save it. That was my logic on the subject, and I investigated it as carefully as I ever investigated anything. I see no way, therefore, but for Congress to place some discretion, to a very small extent, (for you must remember there are about two thousand employes in the Treasury Department,) in the Secretary of the Treasury to tide over this difficult time and conduct the business. The principle you may say is a bad one. So it is as a principle. But I will ask my friend from Illinois, if his experience does not afford him proof of many cases where he has been obliged to do a thing that he would gladly have avoided, because he could not do the other thing that he would gladly have done. It is the history of human affairs. We cannot do everything even in Government just as we would like to do it, and in the best way. This was the conclusion that I came to as a Senator before I went into the Department, and I was more confirmed in it after I got into the Department.

Now, with regard to this talk about the Secretary having his favorites, and the Secretary paying this or that man because he supports the President's policy, and all that, it is reducing a man of high character and standing to the level of a blackguard without the slightest foundation or reason for it in the world. I would not impute it to one of my adversaries, unless I saw proof of the actual fact. I have never been known to be particularly enthusiastic in my admiration of the Democratic party; but I never took it for granted that a man who was eminent enough to be placed at the head of a Department would be a mere thief, guilty of mean and low actions in the management of his Department. Sir, it is the pride of every man who goes to the head of a Department to conduct it well and fairly. He must be impartial; he must be just. His own reputation and his position require it. The idea that because we do not like the present Secretary of the Treasury, therefore we are to presume that he would descend to these little tricks, and spend money that is committed to him for a public purpose in accomplishing his own private purposes, is not only doing him injustice, but doing no credit to the individual, whoever he may be, that entertains an idea of that description with regard to a public officer, without proof of the fact that it is so. Let us do men justice. Let us quarrel, if we will, about politics with those who do not agree with us; but at any rate I think we had better maintain the intercourse which is due from one gentleman to another, even with regard to our political adversaries.

Now, sir, I have only to say with regard to this amendment, it makes not the slightest difference to me, of course, whether the Senate strike it out or keep it in; but I tell them if they do strike it out, as my friend from Illinois suggests, you will throw the Department into a state of embarrassment which will trouble not only them, but will trouble you necessarily, and trouble the public business; and it will lead, from the want of ability to do the work of that Department, to complaints from men whose interests require that the work should be done, which will not be visited upon the Secretary, but upon the Congress that refused to put it in the Secretary's power to accomplish what he is bound to do.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President—

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. GRIMES. I have only a word to say and shall occupy but a moment. I certainly have been very much instructed, and I have no doubt the Senate have been, by the lessons which the Senator from Maine has given us on the dignity and propriety of public debate. I believe the Senator started out with the proposition that it was exceedingly improper for any member of this body to criticize or say anything against an absent person who was not here to defend himself. Is it possible that the Senator from Maine would deny to us a just criticism of a public officer? Is it possible that it is not fair and legitimate discussion for us to speak of the public acts of the Secretary of the Treasury when it is sought to invest him with a new power, or a power that has never been exercised but once or twice before by an officer under similar circumstances? Does the Senator always confine himself to this rule? It seems to me it is not a very long time ago since I heard some remarks made about the head of another Department who refused, in opposition to the wishes of a distinguished Representative, without any law authorizing him to do it, to send a commission to make a certain investigation. The head of that Department was quite as much absent as the Secretary of the Treasury is to-day. The members of this body were not present upon a celebrated occasion when they were denounced as tinkers of the Constitution, and the most opprobrious language used, in the most offensive and opprobrious manner that it possibly could be used.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator said he was there.

Mr. GRIMES. I was there, but the body was not there. The distinguished tinker at the head of the tinkering committee was not there—the gentleman who of all others was most denounced, I supposed, but who now, forgetting that, defends in the most laudatory manner the gentleman who thus denounced him and his associates. I confess that I have not so much of that spirit of forgiveness which the Senator from Maine is willing to manifest upon this occasion. I have remembered the occurrences of that evening, and the manner of the speaker at the time that he gave his utterances to the mob that was before him.

But then the Senator says that it is very improper for us to speak of political questions upon a matter of business. What political questions have been discussed here by the gentlemen who have opposed this amendment? I understand that this proposition is to invest the Secretary of the Treasury with a discretionary power to dispose of one or two hundred thousand dollars, giving it to such and such clerks as he chooses in his Department. It is a power that has not usually been granted. It is adding to the amount that was appropriated at the last session of Congress and yet unexpended. It is an extraordinary amount. A Senator says that he is unwilling to intrust the Secretary of the Treasury with the disposal of this money, and why? Because he has not got confidence in him. Why has he not got confidence in him? Because he has not obeyed the law of Congress passed two years ago denying him the power to appoint anybody to office unless he should take a certain oath. Is not that a legitimate argument to be urged against the adoption of this amendment? The Secretary appointed persons whom he had no authority to appoint. We required that every appointee, under a certain law, should take a certain oath, and he disregarded that oath. The Senator from Maine says he would have regarded it; he would have obeyed the law of Congress. So would I. I think that any man who had a due regard for his conscience and the laws of Congress, and a proper respect for the authority of the Government, would have done it. I say it is a legitimate reason for expressing a want of confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury, that he refused to obey that law.

Another Senator says that he has lost confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury for the reason that he has not disposed of the gold belonging to the United States in such a manner as he deemed most economical and to the advantage of the Government. Is not that a legitimate criticism? Are we to be denied expressing our opinions on a question of that kind because the Secretary of the Treasury is absent, is not here, and cannot be here, to answer for himself? If it be true that in that instance he has employed a relative; if it be true that that relative made by the sale of the gold $40,000 during the month of May; if it be true that after the rise in gold he sold several millions of gold at 31½ as the outside and highest price, when it had been going in the market two or three hours before at 34 and 35, is not that a legitimate criticism? And have we not authority to know, and ought we not to know, and is it not, I beg to ask the Senator from Maine, somewhat in the duty of the Committee on Finance to inform the Senate, how it happened that he sold so many millions of gold after the market had risen above 31 to 34 and 35, and who were the purchasers of that gold, making the difference on several million dollars between 31½ and 34 or 35 that it had been sold at during the day?

I submit that because the Secretary of the Treasury is not present to answer these questions himself, these matters that are publicly discussed in the newspapers, that are in the mouths of everybody, and that have, no matter what may be the opinion of the Senator from Maine to the contrary, exceedingly lowered the Secretary of the Treasury in the opinion of the financial men of this country, and in the opinion of some of the best of them destroyed all confidence whatever in him—I say that these matters are fair subjects of investigation, fair subjects of criticism; and I, (or any other Senator,) in my judgment, have a right to urge them when such a question as this is under consideration.

Now, sir, when you take into consideration these facts, and take into consideration the proceedings of a public meeting, which were read by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] to the Senate the other day, held and presided over by Treasury clerks denouncing me and denouncing the Senator from Maine in most unmeasured terms as usurpers, as men who were attempting to establish a tyranny in this country, I say that I am not willing to intrust any such extraordinary discretionary power in the hands of the Secretary. I should like to know whether or not the Secretary of the Treasury has taken any notice of the action of those clerks in his Department. Does the Senator from Maine justify that proceeding? If he were still Secretary of the Treasury, and his clerks should denounce Congress in the manner in which we were denounced at that public meeting, would he still retain those clerks in his employment? I am not willing to make any appropriation to enable Mr. McCulloch to pay those clerks or any other clerks who may become associated with them in that departmental club in denouncing Congress. Every gentleman has his own ideas as to what self-respect requires of him; I do not pretend to quarrel with other people as to what may be their ideas of what their own self-respect requires of them; but it seems to me that my self-respect requires that I should not do it.

I have not been disposed any more than the Senator from Maine to impute improper motives to the Secretary of the Treasury. I judge of him by what has gone before; I judge of him by what has already occurred; and I am free to unite in the opinion expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, that I do not have the confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury that I had and that I would desire to have in a person occupying the prominent position that he does in the councils of the country and before the people.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I rose a short time since because I felt called upon to correct a statement made by the Senator from Maine, but which I attributed entirely to misrecollection on his part. I rise now to correct a mistake which I cannot impute to any failure of memory whatever. The Senator took occasion to say that a similar appropriation to this now pending was made a year ago without any objection; and I simply sought to remind him that he was not entirely correct in that by stating the fact that there was objection made. I did not state that I made the objection, although I thought, by calling his attention to the fact that objection was made, I would remind him that I did object to it in committee. He thought himself warranted in replying that if I did not object to it, it was contrary to my usual habit, and formed the exception to my rule of action. I cannot attribute that statement to any failure of memory, and I certainly do not assent to its accuracy. Whether he meant to speak of my conduct here on the floor of the Senate, and to characterize that as capacious, beyond the conduct of other Senators, I do not know. If so, I appeal against its justice to the records that are kept here, and to the observations of those who surround me. If he meant to tell the Senate that that was my conduct in the committee over which he presides, and on which I had the honor to serve for several years, I shall not contradict him. I shall simply leave that statement to be tried and adjudged by those who were associated with both of us on that committee. If his regard for justice or for his own reputation for veracity does not commend to him the propriety of making some qualification of that statement, certainly I shall not enforce it upon his attention. It is proper for me to say, though, to the Senate, in whose favor I desire to hold some sort of place, that I myself dissent from the justice of that remark utterly and altogether. I want to say one thing more: that nobody knows better than that Senator himself that I have consulted him more, not only upon questions pending before his committee, but upon questions pending here in the Senate, than I have consulted any one else; and I rather think, in proportion to the responsibility I have had for the conduct of business here, oftener than anybody else in the Senate; and if that remark could be made of me with any propriety by anybody, it can be made with less propriety by the Senator from Maine than anybody else.

But, sir, let that pass. This is one of the occasions, whether it be within my rule or otherwise, that I have thought it necessary to object to a pending proposition. I supposed it a constitutional right that I had to object; and I have stated my objection to this amendment. I do not undertake to say that I understood the bearing and the force of it exactly when I was upon the floor before; I am not entirely sure that I understand the bearing of it now; but as I understand, the facts, as explained by the Senator from Maine, which are thought to warrant this appropriation, are something like these: an appropriation of $250,000 was made for additional compensation to clerks and for compensation to temporary clerks a year ago; of that sum $130,000 has been expended, leaving $120,000 of that appropriation unexpended; and of that unexpended appropriation it is proposed by a clause in this amendment to appropriate some sixty thousand dollars for the payment of clerks employed last year but receiving a salary of less than $1,000 a year, leaving $60,000 of the last year's appropriation to be applied to the next year's work; and in addition to that a new appropriation of $160,000. If I am correct, that will be $220,000 for the next year's work. Last year $130,000 was thought sufficient and was made to answer the public necessities. Notwithstanding the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance tells us that the public business cannot be discharged without this appropriation, I cannot, for my life, understand why $220,000 is necessary this year when $130,000 only was found necessary last year. My understanding is that these necessities ought to be diminished instead of increased. I understood—I hoped it was the fact—that the number of our disbursing officers, the number of the employees of the Government whose accounts are settled in that Department, was being very materially reduced, and it seems to me there must absolutely be less work at the Treasury Department to do the coming year than there has been the current year or the past year. If $130,000 would answer last year, I cannot understand why a larger sum should be absolutely demanded this year.

But, sir, I do not propose to take any further time in discussing this amendment. I have not uttered a word upon the political aspect of this debate. The time has not come when I feel authorized to say what my impressions are upon those questions. I do not know that the time ever will come. It is not now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose I ought to say a word or two in reply, especially to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES.] All I have to say to him is, that if he had represented me correctly, or if he had understood what I said, he would not have found it necessary to make the remarks that he did. What I said was, or what I intended to say—and I think I did say, for I generally say what I mean—that I thought it bad taste to be assailing public officers on occasions that did not require it, and when we had business matters under discussion; and I expressly put in, I remember, that when any particular subject was under discussion which called for comment, it was all very well, but I thought it had better be omitted except at such times. When I commented upon his model of all that is admirable and elegant, the Secretary of the Navy, [laughter,] the other day, it was on a very peculiarly appropriate occasion. I took occasion to say that the Secretary of the Navy had refused to do a particular thing as the reason for my action in that case. That was all I said; that he had refused to do it; that I had been unable to persuade him to come to that conclusion. The honorable Senator said the Secretary had no power to do it. That may be; but the Secretary admitted that he had the power, or at least did not deny it, and did not give that as a reason for refusing to comply with my request.

Mr. GRIMES. You attributed it to something altogether different.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I attributed it to the fact that he did not mean to do it until we had disposed of another question, because he said so; and if he told the truth, I had the right to repeat it, I take it. When the conduct of any particular officer is properly before the Senate in a given case that calls for remark upon it, I think it eminently proper to speak of it just as Senators please; and they will be their own judges as to the style and taste of their oratory, each one for himself. We cannot, of course, have any rule to regulate that matter.

Now, as to my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] he and I have been friends too long for us to separate upon a careless remark that I made, rather sportive than otherwise, with reference to him. I am sorry that it offended him; and if it did really offend him I will take it back in whole and in part. I did not suppose that he would take it in any other than in a sportive sense; but, unfortunately, I am one of those unhappy individuals that can never even make a joke without its being taken seriously. I do not know what it is owing to; but somehow or other I give offense when I do not mean to do so. But my friend will allow me to say in all sincerity, since he has appealed to me, that he is of a very questioning nature, and is very apt to scrutinize things in a very sharp and careful manner; and I think he does differ with other people, quietly and in a very gentlemanly and proper way, a little oftener than I do; but I may be mistaken about that. We never judge correctly about ourselves in relation to such matters. So far as our relations on the Committee on Finance were concerned, I will say that of all things I would not give the slightest intimation that he was not otherwise than just as he should be there, and I was exceedingly sorry to part with him when he went off. Now, sir, I believe I have made an ample apology, as far as my friend from Wisconsin is concerned.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly if the Senator from Maine was framing a joke when he made the remark he did, I did misunderstand him, and he was misunderstood by others.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is my misfortune.

Mr. HOWE. But it is enough for me to be told by him that that was what he was up to. If he did not mean to give offense I am the last man to take any offense, and he is the last man that I choose to be offended by.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought so.

Mr. HOWE. But as to the other remark he made, that I am after all more inclined to question and object to measures than he is himself, I have only to say that if that is so, I on my part ask pardon of the Senate and of mankind. I did not know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. I rise only to say a few words on this subject. I regret to see the opposition made to this provision in this appropriation bill, because I am convinced from the experience I have had upon the Committee on Finance that it is a necessary appropriation for maintaining the branch of the public service to which it is proposed to be applied. There was great need during the war, and during the enhanced value of commodities and the prices of living in Washington, for an increase in the salaries of men employed in the Departments, particularly an increase in the salaries of the ablest men employed in the Departments. But it could not be done. The necessities of the Government were greater than the necessity of the increase of those salaries, and so the committees of Congress always held. It was found (as was stated here the other day in connection with the bill for the reorganization of the clerical force of the Interior Department) that the best, the most able, the most practiced and experienced men in the Treasury Department were dropping out of their places, going into private business, getting increased salaries, and thus materially affecting, and injuriously affecting, the public service. Therefore, to avoid raising the question of a general increase of the salaries of clerks the mode that is now before us in this appropriation bill was pursued. That was done under former Secretaries of the Treasury; nor was it objected to seriously. It would not be fair to say that it was not objected to at all, but it was not seriously objected to, and its indorsement by the Committee on Finance of the Senate caused its adoption here.

The objection to it is of a twofold character: first because of its not being a very good system. I admit that; but I say in answer to that suggestion that it grew out of the necessities of the case, which were peculiar and extraordinary in their character. The next objection grows out of the present political attitude of the Secretary of the Treasury. As was stated by the honorable Senator from Maine of himself, I may say of myself that I shall not be accused of sympathizing with the peculiar position of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury; I shall not be accused of approving the speech which the Senator from Iowa listened to and which fell from his lips recently in the capital. I think the whole project of developing the opinions of Cabinet ministers by such a process as that was, is an ineffable disgrace to those that engaged in it. I think that every member of the Cabinet who was not a willing party to it and who did not invite it as a means of developing his opinion—and I do not say that any did—would have done himself infinite honor by refusing to appear before that band of wandering minstrels, night-hawks, political scrubs, miserable dependents, political fungi that got up that so-called serenade and perpetrated it. I think that these practices have gone just about far enough near this Government. I think that when the heads of Departments cannot hold their opinions, and whatever opinions their judgments and their consciences give them, without being amenable to the dependents in the Departments, and in addition to them the other class that are seeking political places and appointments, and without being subject to their call, to deliver those opinions whenever they shall see fit, it is a pretty hard state of the case. I hope that we have had the end of political serenading, and speeches in response to such serenades, in this country. I wish that the public opinion of the country was of so elevated and stern a character that it would stamp the man, be he the head of a Department or otherwise, who sought to promulgate opinions in response to such miserable plans and proceedings.

So much for my opinion of that whole business. I need say nothing of the character of the speeches. But, sir, as Secretary of the Treasury, as an economical, honest, conscientious officer of a Department, I believe (and I assert only what I believe upon close observation and some little personal experience) that the present Secretary of the Treasury is as good an officer as ever occupied the place he now fills. I believe that, and believing it I say it.

I think that a little duty is incumbent upon him about this time, and that duty consists in dismissing from the public service those creatures who assail another branch of the Government. This business of mutuality of assault has reached very nearly far enough and ought to stop, and the Secretary of the Treasury should not encourage it by keeping in the public employ, under his direction, any man, no matter who he is, who makes himself prominent in it; and it is his duty to dismiss him from the public service forthwith, and I hope he will do it, and see the line of his duty in doing it.

But, sir, I cannot agree with my associates in the Senate that we should at once declare a want of confidence in the head of the Treasury Department by refusing an appropriation in this shape, because the appropriation is committed to his discretion. Like appropriations have been committed to the discretion of his predecessors in view of the extraordinary circumstances that I have named, and the discretion has been fairly and honestly exercised. I believe it will be so by him, and I think that no issue should be made of a political character as against the Secretary of the Treasury upon a proposition of this kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel it but right and just that I should say a few words in regard to this amendment, because I consider myself to some extent responsible for it, and I shall therefore state the circumstances which led the Committee on Finance to adopt it. At the last session of Congress the first appropriation of this kind was made. It was made at the request of the then Secretary of the Treasury, now a member of the body; but it was made under circumstances which compelled us either to adopt the amendment making an appropriation of $250,000 or to increase the pay of nearly all the officers of the Treasury Department. According to my recollection now, a bill had passed the House of Representatives increasing the pay, perhaps, of all the clerical force in all the Departments twenty per cent. Other propositions of various kinds were pending to increase the pay of officers of the Treasury Department. We had to choose, therefore, between either a general increase of the pay of the clerical force of all the Departments, of the Treasury Department especially, or to appropriate a specific sum to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to retain the most valuable of his employés. At that time I was acting as chairman of the Committee on Finance, and remember very well that the Secretary of the Treasury applied to us for a temporary appropriation to enable him to retain those officers until such time as the pay of the officers might be properly graduated. That was toward the close of the war, when we were in reasonable hopes that the war would end; and there was an indisposition on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Committee on Finance to enter upon the question of the increase of the pay of the different employés of the Government.

Under these circumstances, as a matter of economy, as a matter of prudence, we made an appropriation of $250,000 to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute this money according to his judgment of the public exigency. This was the first appropriation of that kind that had been made. Up to that time appropriations had been made of a somewhat similar character, but different in amount, for extra clerical force. The first appropriation I find made of that kind was made in 1860, before the war, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to "pay for extra clerk hire, preparing and collecting information to be laid before Congress, said clerks to be employed only during the session of Congress, or when indispensably necessary to enable the Department to answer some call made by either House of Congress at one session to be answered at another; and no such extra clerk shall receive more than $3 33½ per day for the time actually and necessarily employed;" and that was paid out of the miscellaneous fund.

The next appropriation I find for extra services was in the year following, or rather at the special session in July, 1861, after the war had commenced. It was an appropriation "for contingent expenses, including compensation of additional clerks who may be employed by the Secretary according to the exigencies of the public service, and additional compensation for extra labor of clerks in his office, $25,000." The next appropriation I find was in the year following, when there was an appropriation "for compensation of additional clerks who may be employed by the Secretary according to the exigencies of the public service, $50,000."

The next appropriation was made the year following, and I will say that every year an appropriation of this kind was made from that time until the appropriation now referred to. The next appropriation was "for compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department; provided that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to classify the clerks according to the grade of their services, or assign to such of them as he shall see fit any compensation not exceeding that of clerks of the first class, $200,000."

That was in 1863. In the winter of 1864-65 the appropriation now in controversy was made. It was made under the circumstances which I have mentioned and I have no doubt that it was wisely made. We were compelled by the circumstances by which we were surrounded either to increase the pay of the officers in the Treasury Department or to make this appropriation and place it in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to give to officers of that Department increased pay. The only question now is in regard to the disposition of it. A portion of this money was assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury to clerks of the higher class, and there was a good deal of complaint made by clerks of the lower grades of this distribution of the money. There was still unexpended when Congress met about one hundred and thirty thousand dollars of this money, and the question is, what shall be done with it? If there was no further disposition made by the Secretary of the Treasury, as a matter of course it would go back into the general fund; but there was a constant pressure by persons who claimed that they were entitled to money for its distribution.

In this amendment, reported from the Committee on Finance, we thought that the first and second class clerks were not entitled to this money, because they were fairly compensated at the rates of $1,200 and $1,400 a year. At any rate, they had no peculiar claims to the money. The question was then, what should be done with the money? We concluded that it was right to give to the women employed in the Treasury Department, whose compensation has been $600 part of the time, part of the time $720, in the nature of a gratuity, $100 each. It is true this is no more defensible than the appropriation of the whole of the money to the lower grade of clerks; but partly, perhaps, on account of the gallantry of the committee, a feeling of sympathy for the ladies, and the fact that they only got about one half the pay of first-class clerks who did the same kind of duties, we unanimously, I believe, agreed to give each of them $100. That reduces the fund very materially, so that the balance on hand would not be, perhaps, more than thirty or forty thousand dollars. I do not know that I can tell; perhaps fifty or sixty thousand dollars. At any rate, $100 each to the ladies employed in the Treasury reduced the fund very much. Then the question was, what should be done with the balance? If distributed pro rata among the clerks of the first and second classes, it would pay them but sixty dollars apiece, according to the estimate, perhaps less than that. This was scarcely sufficient to induce an additional disbursement, and the committee concluded that it was better to let the balance lapse to the general fund as money unexpended. That is the whole history of the disposition of that $250,000.

In regard to the appropriation made for temporary clerks in the Treasury Department and for additional compensation to clerks in that Department, I feel as strongly as any one the objection made to allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute money among the clerks of his Department; and at the very moment that Congress can wisely approach the question of permanent salaries for all the officers of the Government and settle that question upon a wise and just basis, this appropriation ought to cease. Indeed, before the war the appropriation did not exist. The objection made to it by the honorable Senator from Illinois is potent and is unanswerable. It would not be wise in my judgment to place any sum permanently at the disposal of the head of a Department to distribute among the various classes of clerks. It is very unpleasant to the Secretary. It will make all sorts of demands upon him. The Secretary will be compelled to legislate in the distribution of this money. It is a very unpleasant duty. I do not impute anything wrong in saying that I would myself, if I had any power of this kind, desire to have it taken away from me, not that I think I would do injustice in the distribution of the money, but because I do not think that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be compelled to deal out bounties and gratuities to those under his employment. It takes away the sense of manliness and independence. Indeed I think that everybody employed by the Government has a right to a fixed compensation, and a compensation fixed by law; he has a right to receive that for the honest discharge of his services. But the question is whether we are now prepared to enter into a general increase of salaries. If we now legislate upon this subject permanently, we shall have to increase all the salaries in the Treasury Department. Why? Because the expenses of living are so great. That is merely temporary. We know that as we gradually approach specie payments a different state of things will exist, that prices will go down, and then that probably the old salaries will be sufficient.

Under these circumstances the Committee on Finance thought it better, as the House had proposed to continue this appropriation, but to make it $160,000—less than it was before—to give that amount in the manner and in the same mode provided for by the House, for this year at least. We were not at that time, and we are not now prepared to enter upon the general question of the increase of salaries. I think, with perhaps a better knowledge of this matter than most of the Senators who only hear the discussion to-day, that the adjustment made by the committee is a fair and wise one, and it ought not to be disturbed.

If you should defeat the amendment and allow the House bill to stand as it is, it is much more unjust even from your own point of view, because it appropriates the same amount of money; it disposes of the whole of the balance of the $250,000: it gives it to none but clerks of the first and second classes, and excludes the ladies entirely; so that it is not as fair and just as the Senate proposition. On the other hand if you strike out both, you may take away from the Secretary of the Treasury the power to retain in his employment officers who are indispensably necessary for the management of the business of the Treasury Department. I think, therefore, that it is better to leave the question this year to the solution made by the Finance Committee, and if at any time the Senate is willing to approach the question of fixing the compensation of employes of the Treasury Department, we can do it. In the tax bill sent us by the House the other day, they have reorganized one bureau of the Treasury Department, giving largely increased salaries. If we are prepared to extend those same salaries to all the other officers of the Treasury Department, it will much more than absorb your $160,000. It would take twice or three times that sum; and if you propose now to increase the pay and give to the employes that pay which all of us admit they are fairly entitled to, we must be prepared for an expenditure of a much larger sum than $160,000 placed in the power of the Secretary. I think that in a year or two from this time it will be much wiser and better then to settle on a permanent basis the salaries of the various officers of the Government.

In regard to the political questions drawn into this controversy, I have certainly no desire now to engage in their discussion; indeed I do not think they are pertinent. While the Secretary of the Treasury holds that office we are bound to give him all reasonable powers to execute his duties, and we cannot, because we differ with him in opinion, either withhold from him the ordinary powers of the Treasury Department or deny to him those ordinary discretionary powers which are necessary to enable him to perform his functions.

In regard to one subject which has been thrown into this controversy, the disposition of the gold sold in New York the other day, I think if any candid man will read the letter of Mr. Van Dyck in connection with the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, he will see that the action of the officer there was had without consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury, so that the Secretary is not responsible. The action was taken under such a pressure that it was impossible to consult with the Secretary of the Treasury. At most, to say the worst of it, that was a simple error of judgment upon which a good deal may be said on both sides.

Mr. GRIMES. I would inquire of the Senator by whom that pressure was made and upon whom.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was made by the sudden arrival of news from Europe that banks had failed there and that a financial revulsion was likely to occur.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire of the Senator whether or not gold was sold after banking hours had ceased, and after the transactions of the open board were over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know nothing about it except what is stated by Mr. Van Dyck, and he says they received the news at 2:45. That was probably after the ordinary business of banking in New York is disposed of. I have no doubt that if I had been there intrusted with the authority I would not have sold the gold.

Mr. GRIMES. I have the same purpose in view that the Senator from Ohio has. I desire that the public should be able to repose the utmost confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury. It is certainly important to the country that the people should be able to place confidence in him; and as the Senator holds confidential relations with the Secretary of the Treasury—

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all; I do not see him quite so often as you do.

Mr. GRIMES. I have not seen him for a long time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Nor I.

Mr. GRIMES. At any rate I venture to suggest to the Senator that if the public could be informed of the particular time at which this gold was sold, and to whom it was sold, and when it was paid for, probably the confidence of the public might be measurably restored.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator had better propose the raising of a committee to inquire into that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not seen the Secretary of the Treasury since the gold was sold. I know nothing about it but what I see in the public prints. I have never conversed with the Secretary about the sale of gold. My own judgment is that the time for the sale of the Government gold has passed, and that if the Secretary has more than he wants for the legitimate purpose of paying the interest on the public debt, it would be much wiser to apply that gold directly to the purchase of bonds of the United States as they mature. That has been my feeling for a year past, since the war has been over. But that is neither here nor there. The agent selected by Mr. McCulloch to sell gold, I understand, is not a relative in any sense, not even in a remote sense. He is a very distant relation of the Secretary's wife, and that so distant that if I could state it to you—and I cannot correctly although it was given to me by a person who knew—it would excite a smile.

This man was an ordinary broker in New York who received one eighth of one per cent., the ordinary commission for selling gold. But if that is an unreasonable commission for the sale of gold and taking so fearful a responsibility as this, what should be said of the commission allowed by the Secretary of the Navy some years ago of five per cent. to buy vessels, which I believe is forty times as much as the commission allowed to this man for selling gold? At the same time the Secretary of the Treasury cannot be seriously blamed for this, because he was ignorant of it. His general authority to the agent was to keep gold at a certain standard, 130, and he did keep it at that standard; it was kept for nearly a year varying between 125 and 135, gradually declining. The policy of the Secretary was to keep it not above 130, looking to a gradual reduction and resumption of specie payments. That was not only stated by him in his annual report, but it was a fact of public notoriety. Whenever gold went above 130, some was thrown into the market; usually, one hundred thousand dollars or half a million dollars was sufficient to stop any inclination to rise above that; but he was not prepared for this extraordinary state of affairs which came over the wires from Europe. Mr. McCulloch was not there to direct and advise him. Mr. Van Dyck was to give the orders, for Mr. Myers had no authority to sell without the order of Mr. Van Dyck, according to the statement of Mr. Van Dyck himself. Myers was simply the agent to execute orders. He was the simple broker. Van Dyck was the custodian of the gold, an officer under bonds, a man of high character. I believe I never saw him in my life, and would not know him if I met him; but his reputation in the city of New York is certainly of the highest character. He authorized the sale after this news came in. Everybody must have known that the effect of the news would be to put up gold, because under the operation of the news in Europe our bonds had gone down some ten per cent. in gold value in London. Everybody must have known that the effect of that news here would be to advance the price of gold; and the question arose with Van Dyck whether he should sell gold at once or withdraw from the market and let the price of gold suddenly go up, creating alarm and distress, compelling importers of goods to go into the market in order to meet their contracts and pay a largely increased price for gold, crushing perhaps large interests in the city of New York, deranging business, because no one can doubt that if it had not been for the twenty-five millions of gold thrown into the market that night, gold would have gone up probably to 150, and we might have had a panic in this country. These are mitigating circumstances, to say the least, that are mentioned by the officer having charge of this subject, Mr. Van Dyck, and the whole decision was arrived at without the knowledge or consent of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, I ask Senators whether when you take that question with the surrounding circumstances and the explanations that have been made by these officers acting under general instructions given without a knowledge of the new facts that had been flashed over the wires, there was, to say the most, anything more than simply an error of judgment. I think, myself, it is yet very problematical whether the United States will not gain more by the loss of what she might have made by holding and hoarding this gold a little while, by the increased confidence it will be found to have given to our securities abroad; because from the very moment of that first panic they have gradually risen, and I have no doubt that under the advices of the shipment of gold from this country to England they will rise more. I ask, then, whether it is right to arraign the Secretary of the Treasury on this error of judgment, and especially for this reason to deny him a power that we freely gave one year ago to another Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say. I have said this much merely because I was willing, myself, to take my share of the responsibility of the appropriation of $250,000 made a year ago, which I think was made in the Senate without objection. My friend from Wisconsin objected in committee; I do not know whether he objected in the Senate or not; at any rate it was agreed to with very little discussion here, and only after full consideration and by the general and hearty consent of both Houses. By appropriating $250,000 in the way I have mentioned, we prevented the Treasury from being saddled with a permanent increase of salaries to the various officers of the Treasury Department which would absorb probably two or three times the amount that we did appropriate.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, I was a member of the committee which reported this bill, and we considered it well. I think it is just and proper to intrust this matter to the Secretary of the Treasury. I believe the discretion was properly confided to him a year ago to do what he was then authorized to do, and I believe it is necessary now. Least of all did I expect that objection would be made to the proposition on political grounds. The politics of the Secretary would not make any difference in the vote which I should give on such a subject, because I think it is necessary that we should intrust the Secretary of the Treasury and all the Secretaries at the head of the various Executive Departments with the power that is necessary to enable them to discharge the duties confided to them by the positions which they hold. A great deal must depend necessarily upon the organization of the Departments, and the proper and appropriate positions which the various clerks hold, and the business to which they devote themselves. I recollect that when I went into the Treasury Department the whole Mexican war debt remained unsettled, and there was an immense amount of unsettled accounts in the Department. The suggestion was made, and in some instances it was allowed by Congress, to have additional clerks employed. I soon found, however, that the business of the Department was delayed by clerks who knew nothing of the proper business, and that experts were needed.

There was a band of clerks consisting of from ten to twelve who were sent from Department to Department to bring up the arrearages, and these were the ablest and best clerks that could be selected in the Departments, and with their aid the arrearages were brought up and soon brought up. When any Department of the Government is in arrear in the settlement of its accounts the head of the Department must see to it that they are brought up, and he must use the means that are within his power. Any man at the head of a Department will soon learn that there are certain men who have become experts, who are industrious, faithful, and diligent in the discharge of their business, while there are others who never can be improved, and never are improved as long as they stay there.

I think this provision is necessary for the Treasury Department; and at no time since the beginning of the Government has that Department had more need of an efficient body of clerks than it has now. The foreign trade of the country is just commencing anew after the war under a system of duties that must necessarily be high. The questions arising under internal duties, which are very extensive and require a great many assessors and collectors and vigilant officers, are thrown upon the Treasury Department. All the accounts for money coming into the Treasury and money paid out are settled at the Treasury Department according to the system established by Alexander Hamilton, and no Secretary since his day has attempted materially to change the system. All moneys coming into the Treasury are paid in the Treasury upon warrant, and all moneys paid out are paid upon warrant; and it is necessary for the Secretary of the Treasury to have an able and efficient and sufficient corps of clerks to discharge the duties. The Government never can understand and know that these officers are faithful unless they have a Secretary over them in whom they can confide and trust with such confidence as is proposed by this amendment. I understand that they have been organizing for years past an Internal Revenue Bureau, extensive in officers, extensive in new legal questions and new regulations. Our condition is such that of course it was impossible to have experts in that business, and the only way was to train them up, and they must obtain knowledge and become experienced in that branch by intercourse with the other branches of the Treasury Department.

I am sorry for the distrust that is manifested and expressed in relation to the Secretary of the Treasury. I knew him in the State of Indiana, where he had the reputation of being an honest man, and I have never heard anything to the contrary. I believe he is discharging his duties to the best of his skill and ability; and I think it is the interest of the nation now that he should have not only the confidence of the President, but the confidence of Congress and the confidence of the country.

I can hardly be said to belong to the Government party, though I have always been a Union man, and raised my voice and made what efforts I could to preserve the unity of the country. But if I were otherwise, and if I came here to fill a place, I would not cripple the Government in any of its Departments by depriving it of the ability and the capacity to make a fair and honest administration of that Department.

I think we can fairly trust this matter to the Secretary of the Treasury. I think the majority should have confidence in him. I wish they had larger confidence and more trust in the South than they seem to have. I have not quarreled with them because they differed with me. I would not cripple the Government in any of its Departments or any of its operations so as thereby to bring it into disgrace. I think it very singular if we should refuse its authority because the Secretary may have made a political speech which is distasteful to us. I think it very likely that I should not have made such a speech, one which, it is said, called Congress in question; but I will not for that reason cripple him in the management of his Department.

I think it is unfortunate for the country that Congress has differed with the President; but still it is the Government of the United States; it is the Administration of the Union party who have suppressed this rebellion, and who look to the conciliation and restoration of these States; and I hope and trust we shall not let a little distrust of the Secretary of the Treasury induce us to cripple a most important Department of Government.

Why, sir, the New York brokers and dealers can furnish arguments pro and con in relation to the sale of this gold that it would take Congress to sit and decide the right and justice of it as long as we have been settling about admitting the southern States, and we should come, I suppose, to about just as satisfactory a conclusion among ourselves that we have now in relation to the Secretary of the Treasury.

I trust that on reflection the Senate will see the necessity of passing this amendment and putting the Secretary of the Treasury in a condition to discharge his duties faithfully, honestly, and successfully.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is the amendment divisible?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a motion to strike out and insert. In the opinion of the Chair it is not divisible.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I hope the Senate will vote against the amendment, and then I shall propose to strike out the House proposition also.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, Williams, and Yates—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Poland, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Cowan, Dixon, Henderson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Sumner, Wiley, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out from the appropriations for the Treasury Department lines three hundred and eighty-eight, three hundred and eighty-nine, three hundred and ninety, and three hundred and ninety-one, as follows:

For compensation of additional clerks who may be employed by the Secretary according to the exigencies of the public service, and additional compensation for extra labor of clerks in his office, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the following clause, lines four hundred and fifty-five to four hundred and fifty-eight, namely:

For compensation of the Secretary of the Interior, Assistant Secretary, chief clerk, and the clerks, messenger, assistant messengers, watchmen, and laborers in his office, $48,700.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That needs alteration. The amount appropriated should be $46,380 instead of $48,700. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next clause was read as follows:

For compensation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, chief clerk, recorder, draughtsman, assistant draughtsman, clerks, messengers, assistant messengers, packers, watchmen, and laborers in his office, $178,200.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That needs amendment also. The appropriation should be $175,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line four hundred and seventy-seven.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to reduce the appropriation for the compensation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, clerks, messenger, &c., in his office, in lines four hundred and seventy-six and four hundred and seventy-seven, from $32,000 to $31,940.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the next clause I move to reduce the appropriation, in lines four hundred and eighty and four hundred and eighty-one, for the Commissioner of Pensions and the clerks, &c., in his office, from $216,920 to $215,240.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line five hundred and eighty-eight.

The committee proposed in line five hundred and eighty-five to strike out "[Laws, page 452.]"

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is merely a verbal amendment; the words are unnecessary. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to insert after the word "concerned," in line five hundred and seventy-seven, these words:

Including legal assistance to the Attorney General and other special and extraordinary expenditures in cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, in which the United States are concerned.

So as to make the clause read:

For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia, and also for jurors and witnesses, in aid of funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and previous years, and likewise for defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, including legal assistance to the Attorney General and other special and extraordinary expenditures in cases in the Supreme Court of the United States in which the United States are concerned, and of prosecutions for offenses committed against the United States, and for the safe-keeping of prisoners, in addition to the unexpended balances of appropriations to the credit of the judiciary fund on June 30, 1866, required to meet the expenses of the courts being reestablished in the southern States, so much of the act of March 2, 1865, carrying said unexpended balances of appropriations into the Treasury being, and the same is hereby, repealed, $300,000.

For additional compensation to subordinate employes, according to act of June 25, 1864, $5,680.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I observe that many provisions of this kind are stricken out throughout the bill. I desire to inquire the meaning of it. I know that some of these subordinate employes are very poorly paid. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance what persons this affects, who they are, and what additional compensation the act referred to allows them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The House of Representatives, as they went along, made an appropriation in the first place for the ordinary salaries, and then for the twenty per cent. additional allowed by another law. The Committee on Finance thought it best to leave out all these specific appropriations, and to provide in one section for all these cases.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is the same thing provided in another section?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is what we have done. Perhaps it may be as well to retain the specific appropriation in each case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no object in retaining the clause if the matter is elsewhere provided for.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So the committee thought. It is for the Senate to decide.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike from the appropriations for the Paymaster General's office, lines six hundred and thirteen, six hundred and fourteen, and six hundred and fifteen, as follows:

For compensation of authorized additional, and for temporary clerks, $37,000: Provided, That the salaries allowed to the female clerks in said Department shall be $720 per annum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out that proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out from the appropriations for the Post Office Department, lines seven hundred and eighty-one, seven hundred and eighty-two, and seven hundred and eighty-three, in the following words:

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to make an amendment to the clause last read. In line nine hundred and thirty-six I move to strike out "by them" and insert "in carrying into effect the steamboat inspection law," so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of ten supervising and fifty-six local inspectors, appointed under act of the 30th of August, 1852, for the better protection of the lives of passengers by steamboats, with traveling and other expenses incurred in carrying into effect the steamboat inspection law, including the expenses of their annual meeting, $85,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line nine hundred and seventy-eight.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the following clause in lines ten hundred and fifty-four, ten hundred and fifty-five, ten hundred and fifty-six, and ten hundred and fifty-seven:

PAY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. DELANO. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill amendatory of the act of April 17, 1866, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1867."

The bill repeals so much of the act of April 17, 1866, as repeals section two of the act regulating the pay of the Navy.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not like to have this bill considered at this time. I think it had better be referred. I infer that it relates to the same section that my colleague referred to the other day, that gives to naval officers thirty-three per cent. over what they now receive. It may be worthy of consideration by the House whether naval officers ought not to have increased pay; and for the purpose of having that subject considered I would like to have this bill referred.

Mr. DELANO. I hope the House will indulge me in saying a few words. The act making appropriations for the Navy for this year repeals the second section of the act of 1835, which second section excluded all allowances of commutation for quarters, fuel, &c. I suppose that neither this House nor the Senate, when the naval appropriation bill passed, understood the effect of the amendment. The effect of the measure is disclosed, however, by the order issued by the Secretary of the Navy, giving thirty-three per cent. under certain circumstances and thirty per cent. under certain other circumstances. I have taken the trouble to go to the Treasury Department to ascertain the probable annual expense under that order. It was reported to me officially at $1,300,000 per annum.

Now, I know from conversations with Senators, that when this section of the law of 1835 was repealed, the Senate did not understand what it was doing; and I am equally well satisfied that the House did not understand what it was doing.

Now, I do not know but what the pay of the Navy should be increased, but this is an unworthy manner of effecting such increase. I say, therefore, that the House owes it to itself to restore the law of 1835, and that when the pay of the Navy is increased, it should be done in a legitimate way, so that we shall know what we are doing. It is, perhaps, wise that we should fix the pay of the Navy, as we are fixing the pay of the Army, definitely. I hope the House will restore the law of 1835. I shall not be found illiberal or unjust whenever the question of the pay of the Navy comes up.

Mr. LE BLOND. I agree with my colleague in reference to this matter, but I would rather that the bill should be referred.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PIKE. I ask unanimous consent to make an explanation on this question.

No objection was made.

Mr. PIKE. I have just come into the House, and as I understand the Committee on Naval Affairs has been referred to in connection with this bill I would like to make a short statement. The amendment which increases the pay of the Navy was made in the Senate, and when it came here it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Naval Affairs had nothing to do with it. The Committee on Appropriations, who considered it intelligently and understood perfectly its effect, reported it to the House and the House passed the amendment; whether they understood it or not was their business. I presume that upon this, as upon all other measures, they knew what they were about.

The pay of the Navy ought to be increased, and as to the mode of pay, I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] that a change should be made both in the Army and in the Navy. And I hope some similar bill to that which passed the House will also pass the Senate; and following that that the pay of the Navy will be made to assimilate to the pay of the Army, as the rank assimilates; so that rank for rank the pay of the Navy will be the same as the pay of the Army, and be paid in such a way that everybody can understand just what the pay is, and not have it depend, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] has said this bill will depend, upon the action of the Secretary of the Navy, in the same way that the pay of the Army now depends upon the action of the Secretary of War.

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to Jane E. Shane a pension, as the widow of Lieutenant Colonel James M. Shane, late Lieutenant colonel of the ninety-eighth Ohio volunteer infantry, who was killed at Kennesaw Mountain, in the State of Georgia.

MICHIGAN LAND-GRANT RAILROADS.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Public Lands a bill (S. No. 243) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some point on or near Traverse bay, in the State of Michigan, and for the completion of said road, with a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will explain in a few words the object of the proposed substitute for the Senate bill. It is simply to extend the time of this grant, without any additional appropriation of land, and to provide for the consolidation of one or more companies for the building of a single line of railroad; in which event the particular grants may be applied so far as consolidated, not to exceed ten sections of land to the mile. The bill has been carefully considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and the substitute now proposed I believe is agreed upon by all parties as the very best thing that can be done.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the substitute may be read.

The substitute was read at length. The first section provides that the time limited by the fourth section of an act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1856, for the completion of the railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some point on or near Traverse bay, shall be, and is hereby, extended for the period of seven years from and after the 3d day of June, 1866; and that said grant shall continue and remain in full force and effect for and during that period as if it had been so provided in said fourth section of said act of June 3, 1856; provided that the Amboy, Lansing, and Traverse Bay Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, shall forfeit all right to said grant, or any part thereof, which it may now have, or which may hereafter be conferred upon it by the Legislature of the State of Michigan, if and whenever the said company shall fail, in whole or in part, fully and completely to perform any of the following conditions, that is to say:

1. To clear, grub, and grade twenty consecutive miles of the road-bed of said road between Owosso and Saginaw City, so that the same shall be in readiness for the ties and iron by the 1st day of January, 1867.
2. To fully complete the said road from Owosso to Saginaw City, so that the same shall be in readiness for the running of trains by the 1st day of November, 1867.
3. To fully complete in like manner twenty miles of said road in each and every year after the said 1st day of November, 1867, and to fully complete the entire road by the time limited by this act.

And it is further provided that in case of the failure of the said Amboy, Lansing, and Traverse Bay Railroad Company to perform any of the above conditions by the respective times limited therefor, the Legislature of the State of Michigan may, at its first session after any such failure, confer the said grant upon some other railroad corporation or corporations, upon such terms and conditions as the Legislature may see fit to prescribe, to carry out the purposes of the said act of June 3, 1856; and when so conferred such corporation or corporations shall be entitled to have and enjoy all of the said grant which shall not then have been lawfully disposed of, to the same extent and in the same manner and for the same purposes as if the same had been originally conferred upon such corporation or corporations. Any such authorized corporation or corporations now organized or hereafter to be organized, upon which said grant may be so conferred, in whole or in part, may receive the same without prejudice to any land grant or other rights or franchises previously acquired. But in no case shall such corporation or corporations be entitled to receive more than ten sections of land to the mile for that portion of said road which may be consolidated in accordance with the provisions of this act.

It is further provided, that if the Legislature shall in any such case of failure so confer said grant as before provided, the said lands, or so much thereof as shall then remain not lawfully disposed of, shall be subject to the disposal and future control of the Legislature, as provided in section three of the act of June 3, 1856, until the expiration of the time limited by this act; but in case the Legislature shall in such case fail to confer the grant, then the land shall revert to the United States.

The second section provides that the Flint and Pere Marquette Railroad Company may change the western terminus of its road to some point on Lake Michigan at or south of Grand Traverse bay, and any railroad corporations having a right to the respective land grants specified in the act of June 3, 1856, located in the lower peninsula of the State of Michigan, may unite and contract with each other or with any other railroad corporation or corporations for the construction and operation of a single line of road for any portion of their routes, without prejudice to any land grants or other rights or franchises previously acquired; and any and all such corporations are authorized to change the location of the lines of their road, so far as may be necessary for the purpose of such consolidation, but not so as to change their respective termini otherwise than is authorized by this act. And whenever any change of terminus or location of line is made, as provided for in this act, the corporation or corporations making such change shall file in the General Land Office new maps definitely showing such change and the new line of road adopted; provided, that the road mentioned in the first section of this act shall run on the west side of Saginaw river, and that the principal depot shall be located in the northern portion of the plat of Saginaw City, so as best to accommodate the cities of Saginaw and East Saginaw.

The third section provides that all lands granted by the act of June 3, 1856, to aid in the construction of the railroad described in the first section of this act shall be disposed of only in the following manner: when the Governor of the State of Michigan shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that ten or more consecutive miles of said road have been completed in a good and substantial manner, as a first-class road, stating definitely the commencement and termination of each completed portion of said road, and the corporation or corporations so entitled to lands on account thereof, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause patents for lands for such completed portion of said road to be issued to said corporation or corporations, provided that none of said lands shall be acquired or so patented for any portion of said road so completed south of the intersection of said road with the Detroit and Milwaukee railway until the whole of said road north of said intersection shall have been completed, and the lands therefor patented; and provided further, that the road mentioned in the first section of this act shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, and shall transport free of toll or other charges all property, troops, and munitions of war belonging to the same.

The fourth section provides for the repeal of all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

Mr. DRIGGS. I rise to call the previous question, but yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BEAMAN,] who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move to strike out "January" and insert "February;" so that instead of reading "January 1, 1867," it will read "the 1st of February, 1867."

Mr. DRIGGS. I accept the amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask whether the bill has been printed.

Mr. DRIGGS. It is a Senate bill and has been printed. The substitute, however, has not been printed. If no one desires to ask any further questions I will call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. Speaker, detained this morning by my recent indisposition, I was not present when consent was asked to report the pending bill from the Committee on Public Lands. It was out of the usual order and unexpected. My purpose was to speak at length upon the bill and review its provisions. I am cut off from debate and have barely the privilege of explaining my vote. There are two features of the measure to which I cannot lend my assent. For ten years lands have been reserved from market ostensibly to construct the Flint and Pere Marquette road. Now, it is proposed to change the terminus at Pere Marquette to some other undefined point without the consent of the inhabitants in the vicinity who have long suffered from these land reservations. The other and most objectionable feature is an extension of time for the completion of the road and consequent further extension of railroad land reservations. The people of my State have already suffered sufficiently by these ruinous reservations for speculative railroads. Emigration is retarded and business generally impeded. To grant a further extension of time is perilous to the vital interests of the sections immediately concerned, and fraught with mischief to the State. Such an imposition would be intolerable, and I am against the bill in its present form and shall vote "no" on its passage.

The bill was passed.

Mr. DRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FOXNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed House bill No. 406, to provide for the settlement of accounts of certain public officers, without amendment; also, that it had passed a bill of the following title, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House: Senate bill No. 343, to quiet land titles in California.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. McCULLOUGH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back House bill No. 559, to authorize the extension, construction, and use by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of a railroad from between Knoxville and Monocacy Junction into and within the District of Columbia, with an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said railroad company shall commence the construction of said extension of said road within one year and complete the same within three years after the passage of this act; and on failure to do so, the privileges granted by this act shall be forfeited by said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should like to have a word of explanation of this measure.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company have permission from the State of Maryland to make a lateral road from Monocacy Junction to the city of Washington, so as to prevent persons coming from the West being compelled to go to Baltimore. All this bill does is to give permission to the road to enter this city.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a road reaching up the Potomac to the Point of Rocks in which the West feels greatly more interest than in any possible branch this side which may be proposed; and I should like to know something about the points of this lateral road. I will say candidly, I fear it is a scheme by which the road up the Potomac by the way of Point of Rocks is to be defeated, and some other substituted.

Mr. F. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, being the immediate Representative of the community most interested in this improvement I ask my colleague to yield to me to respond to the inquiries made by the gentleman from Ohio. The road proposed is intended to be a part of a great northwest line from the seat of Government by the way of the town of Cumberland. It is made in accordance with the act of the General Assembly of Maryland clothing the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company with the full and ample power to accomplish the undertaking. It will intersect the Baltimore and Ohio railroad at the Point of Rocks, with which gentlemen of the West are familiar. It is a proposition that the travel and transportation from the West shall pass on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad by the town of Cumberland.

A few days since, with a view of completing the connection between Washington and Pittsburgh, Congress passed a bill of somewhat peculiar and novel character, unlike any law I ever remember to have seen on the statute-book. The State of Maryland a very few years ago gave to a company a right to construct a railroad from the town of Cumberland to the Pennsylvania line in the direction of Pittsburgh. The State of Pennsylvania gave the right to make a road from the city of Pittsburgh to the Pennsylvania line in the direction of Cumberland; the two roads making a complete communication between Cumberland and Pittsburgh.

Through influences of which I need not speak, the Pennsylvania Legislature have been induced to repeal that charter. That repealing law was passed after Maryland, as one of the stockholders of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, a corporation duly authorized by the laws of Maryland, had expended on the construction of a railroad between Pittsburgh and Cumberland $2,500,000.

At the present session a bill has passed this Congress, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] intended to revive in effect that charter which the State of Pennsylvania had repealed. The bill proceeds under the theory that that declaration upon the face of the Constitution of the United States, which denies to a State the right to impair the obligation of a contract, is not to be considered by Congress as a dead letter, but whenever a State undertakes to impair the obligation of a contract it is the duty of the Government of the United States to interpose and apply a remedy against the proposed wrong. Hence the law of Congress, while extending no act of incorporation to make a thoroughfare, simply declared the law of Pennsylvania a nullity, leaving the expenditure made on that branch of this road inside of the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania to be availed of by the authority holding that charter. The law of Congress not only declares that the law of Pennsylvania is a nullity, but it affixes penalties to the attempt on the part of any person inside the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania to exercise any authority which the law of Pennsylvania had conferred upon her own population.

The completion of this road from here to the Point of Rocks, if the law to which I have referred is ruled to be constitutional, is an essential work with a view to that line of communication between the seat of Government and the Northwest at Pittsburgh. It is to be made in conformity with the laws of Maryland, and therefore no question arises under this bill as to the constitutional competency of Congress to create a power in a State, independent of and in defiance of a State, to make works of internal improvement.

Representing, as I do, that section of Maryland which is very much interested in this work, I am very anxious to see it completed. It will lessen the distance from the Point of Rocks to the seat of Government by forty-three or forty-four miles, by avoiding the present elbow of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. And when the junction in Pennsylvania is completed it will lessen the distance between Washington and Pittsburgh to all parties coming from the Northwest on the great line to which I have referred, by, I think, at least seventy-four miles.

Under these circumstances I do not see that there is any grave objection to be urged against this bill. Certainly I do not think the gentlemen from the Northwest will be desirous of interposing obstacles in the way. This is a mere law authorizing the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to exercise within the jurisdiction of the General Government powers analogous to those which the same corporation are authorized to exercise within the jurisdiction of Maryland.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am fully aware of the character of the general plan for extending a road from Washington westward, so as to accommodate the Northwest generally, which has been so clearly explained to the House by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. F. THOMAS.] When the bill was read it was suggested to me, and I thought I heard myself something in reference to extending it to Frederick City. I desire to inquire now whether this line of road, instead of being directed toward Cumberland, striking the Baltimore and Ohio railroad at the Point of Rocks, is to be extended up to Monocacy.

Mr. F. THOMAS. This road is to intersect the Baltimore and Ohio railroad between the Point of Rocks and Monocacy.

Mr. SCHENCK. Where is Knoxville?

Mr. F. THOMAS. It is west of the Point of Rocks, near South mountain, between that point and Harper's Ferry, on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

Mr. SCHENCK. With that explanation, it seems to me that the bill would carry out the great object which we of the West have in view.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. The bill merely gives the company the right to enter the District.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I understand from gentlemen advocating this bill that it simply gives authority for this railroad company to enter the District of Columbia and traverse the domain of the city of Washington.

Mr. LE BLOND. I infer, from the reading of the bill and from a remark made by my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that it proposes an extension of the road through a portion of the State of Maryland. I shall ask for the reading of the bill again.

Mr. SCHENCK. My colleague is laboring under a misapprehension. I supposed that the object of the bill was to direct the line up the Monocacy in the direction of Frederick City. I find that the word "Frederick" is only used in the bill in reference to crossing Frederick county, which, as my colleague is aware, runs down to the Monocacy.

Mr. LE BLOND. If the bill only gives this company power to come into the District of Columbia I certainly have no objection to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it does nothing more than to authorize the extension of the line into the District of Columbia.

The question was taken; and the bill was passed.

Mr. McCULLOUGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN M'GONISH.

Mr. COFFROTH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report on the petition of John McGonish; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM JONES.

Mr. COFFROTH also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, the bill of the House (No. 523) granting a pension to William Jones.

The bill was laid upon the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

ABIGAIL RYAN.

Mr. COFFROTH also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill of the Senate (S. No. 323) for the relief of Mrs. Abigail Ryan.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Abigail Ryan, widow of Thomas A. Ryan, late a sergeant in company E, seventeenth West Virginia volunteers, upon the pension-roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. COFFROTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABSENCE DURING SESSIONS.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I desire to ask leave for the members of the Committee on Enrolled Bills to be absent during the sessions of this House. At this period of the session it becomes necessary for some one or more members of the committee to be absent during the sitting of the House for the purpose of comparing bills and presenting them to the President for signature.

No objection was made, and leave was granted accordingly.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and bill of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 69) making an appropriation to enable the President to negotiate treaties with certain Indian tribes; and

An act (H. R. No. 621) to regulate and secure the safe-keeping of public money intrusted to disbursing officers of the United States.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. COOK. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House, on yesterday, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary a bill to limit the time for bringing suits before the Court of Claims.

APPOINTMENT TO AND REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House yesterday recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary a bill for the regulation of appointments to and removals from office.

MICHIGAN MILITIA.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of certain companies of Michigan militia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CANAL AND SEWERAGE COMPANY.

The House then resumed the consideration of Senate bill No. 190, to incorporate the District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company. The pending question was upon the motion of Mr. STEVENS to reconsider the votes by which the House agreed to sundry amendments to the bill; upon which Mr. F. THOMAS was entitled to the floor.

Mr. F. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I am very sensible that my physical condition is hardly such as to justify my taking any extended part in this discussion. But the House has so kindly adjourned this discussion from day to day that I cannot with any propriety ask for any further indulgence in that respect at this time.

I shall content myself at this time with excluding all collateral matters and presenting as brief a statement of the facts of this case as I can possibly make consistent with my desire to be understood, referring to the laws that seem to me to bear materially upon this question. In now taking part in this debate I depart from my almost uniform habit of silence in Congress; and it is right for me to say that this bill is one which, in my judgment, is vitally important to my immediate constituents. And because it is in many respects of a local character, a duty is devolved upon me which perhaps no other member of this House will undertake to discharge—the duty of endeavoring to place before this House the facts and the law which govern this case.

And after having examined, with a great deal of care, all the laws of Congress and all the laws of the States of Maryland and Virginia that seem to have relation to this subject, I must be permitted to express my surprise that such a proposition as that now under consideration could be reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia. The proposition is equivalent to seizing a very large amount of property invested under a solemn compact entered into between the Government of the United States and the States of Maryland and Virginia. And not only that, but it proposes to leave on the hands of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company another amount of property, costing originally, I suppose, $500,000; for which the corporators, to whom it is now proposed to make this grant, are to give not one dollar, although they are to be benefited by all that enormous expenditure.

Now, that I may not be suspected of making these very round assertions without just warrant, a little detail at this point is indispensable. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company was organized in 1823, 1824, and 1825, under acts passed by the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland, and by the Congress of the United States during that interval of time. By this charter they were authorized to begin a canal where it now begins, at the western terminus of the Washington canal, and to extend it across the Alleghany mountains. But that has been abandoned since the introduction of railroads, and it now terminates in the town of Cumberland, in the coal regions.

Every precaution was taken by the States of Maryland and Virginia to prevent any disturbance in the future of the rights they were thus soliciting from Congress. And it is not out of place for me to say here that those precautions were wise and exhibited much foresight. Although Virginia put in a small sum toward the construction of that large work, Maryland has now invested in it nearly seventeen million dollars. Now let me recur, in the presence of lawyers here, to the precautions taken, and then we can judge whether Congress will undertake to disregard every obligation Congress has assumed and trample under foot the rights of a corporation which owes its very existence to the laws to which I refer, and give to non-residents of the District all the advantages that are to be derived in part from the large expenditures others have made.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] give way to allow me to make a motion to postpone this bill until December next?

Mr. F. THOMAS. I will say, diverging at right angles from the line of argument I have been pursuing, that no motion could be more appropriate.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I am willing to submit that motion if the gentleman will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I will do so with pleasure. But first let me make a remark or two to show the great propriety of such a motion.

Two months ago, or more, the Senate, by a resolution, called upon the Secretary of War to appoint engineers to examine this Washington canal and report a mode of improvement to accomplish two purposes—one in reference to the sanitary condition, and the other in reference to the commercial capabilities of the canal. Those engineers have reported, and I have that report before me. Those engineers have reported to Congress a plan of improvement to relieve us from all apprehension in regard to the health of the city, such as was felt at the beginning of this session from the condition in which the canal was then found. The course so pointed out by the engineers has been pursued by the corporate authorities of Washington until the board of health interposed and forbade any further work upon it at this season of the year. This was not done, however, until the improvements on the canal removed all apprehension of its evil influence on the health of the city.

Those engineers also reserved to themselves the right to make a more full and comprehensive report as to the mode and manner in which this improvement shall further be conducted by Congress if Congress shall see proper to take it in hand with a view to its commercial capabilities. Those engineers have not yet completed their labors, and the House will therefore see at once that this question is not ripe for action at this time. But they will have time to complete their labors long before the period to which it is now proposed by the gentleman over the way this bill shall be postponed. And then Congress can resume the consideration of the subject with a full knowledge of all the bearings of the question upon the commerce and convenience of the seat of Government, and the commerce and convenience of that glorious section of country that I have the honor to represent upon this floor. I acquiesce cheerfully in the proposition to postpone this subject.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, not taking the floor when Mr. F. THOMAS resumed his seat,

Mr. COBB obtained the floor, and was recognized by the Speaker pro tempore, [Mr. BEAMAN.]

Mr. DAVIS. In the temporary absence of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARDING,] I will move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until December next.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I will do what I have never done before in a deliberative assembly, call the previous question upon the motion to postpone.

Mr. COBB. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I did not yield the floor, except upon the understanding that a motion to postpone should be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] had taken his seat, and therefore recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COBB] as obtaining the floor.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I only yielded to a motion to postpone, after having made some remarks upon that proposition to show the propriety of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] if he demanded the previous question before he yielded the floor and took his seat.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I have never yielded the floor at all, but for a motion to postpone to be made.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] notified the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS,] while he was addressing the House upon this bill, that he would move to postpone this bill until December next, if the gentleman from Maryland would yield to him for that purpose. The gentleman from Maryland said he would yield for that purpose, but before doing so he would give some reasons why the motion to postpone should prevail. Having concluded his remarks upon that point, he called upon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] to make that motion, taking his seat for that purpose. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] not responding, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COBB] then claimed the floor. I then arose and addressed the Chair and submitted the motion which the gentleman from Illinois did not submit, so as to accomplish the purpose for which the gentleman from Maryland resumed his seat.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I do not think there can be any doubt in reference to the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide the question of order raised by the gentleman from Maryland. The House was about to vote on the motion to postpone, when the gentleman resumed his seat and the floor was given to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I yielded the floor only that the motion to postpone might be submitted.

The SPEAKER. After the motion was entertained the gentleman resumed his seat, which left the motion open to general debate, when the gentleman from Wisconsin rose and was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I may have committed an error. I resumed my seat in order that the gentleman on my right might make a motion to postpone until December next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland did resume his seat, and the gentleman from Wisconsin obtained the floor.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I did not yield the floor but for the purpose of having that motion submitted. I made my comments why the motion to postpone should be agreed to, and then yielded to the gentleman from Illinois to make the motion, as he desired. I did not consider the motion legitimately before the House until I yielded to the gentleman from Illinois for that purpose. He not appearing, the motion was made for him by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS.] But, sir, I waive all formality and yield the floor.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman from Maryland is desirous to go on with his remarks I am willing to yield the floor to him; but I am not disposed to yield to a motion to postpone without discussion. I know very well before a vote can be taken on this bill it is probable that a vote will be taken on the motion to postpone; I know I cannot prevent that; I do not desire to do so; but I do not desire it shall be done before we have had an opportunity to be heard. If I am not mistaken, the gentleman has been heard for an hour on this bill, and perhaps the gentleman would prefer the vote should be taken on the motion to postpone without any discussion on the part of the friends of the bill.

I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Maryland to go on with his remarks with the understanding that the friends of the bill shall have an opportunity to answer him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin would have the right to be heard after the previous question was seconded.

Mr. F. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, it is the height of my ambition on all occasions to allow to a majority of the House an opportunity to dispose of any proposition as they may desire, and hence I was perfectly willing to waive discussion for a motion to postpone this bill to December next. I will not make any remark on that subject, except to say to my friend from Wisconsin that he is mistaken in supposing the discussion has been all on my side. He will remember that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] the chairman of the committee, occupied an hour in advocacy of this measure without the slightest opportunity for reply.

Mr. COBB. I will reply when the gentleman has finished.

Mr. F. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I will proceed now from the point to which I had progressed when interrupted. I will call the attention of the House to the laws bearing on the question; and I will read from them, that their peculiar character may be fixed in the minds of members; that they may know it is no ordinary question they propose to decide in this bill, because if this principle be sanctioned by the Congress of the United States, capitalists from one end of the country to the other must necessarily be alarmed by such an exposition of political morals. It strikes vitally, in my judgment, at all internal improvements of the country. For if the precautions taken in this case by Maryland and Virginia do not guaranty to this canal corporation a perfect security against such legislation as is here proposed, then there are no precautions that can be taken anywhere, from one end of the country to the other, that can make capital safe.

I hold in my hand the act of the State of Virginia which was the initiatory measure to the creation of this corporation. The act was passed on the 27th of January, 1824. It is in the ordinary form of an act of incorporation granting the ordinary powers to the company. I will read a single clause in this law:

"Provided, That before this act takes effect the Congress of the United States shall authorize the States of Virginia and Maryland, or either of them, to take and continue a canal from any point of the above-named canal or the termini thereof, through the territory of the District of Columbia or any part thereof to the territory of the said States or either of them in any direction they may deem proper."

Maryland ratified that law of Virginia. But Maryland goes further, and out of abundant caution in a subsequent act, passed in December, 1825, makes still more perfect the compact between Maryland and the Government of the United States which this bill, if passed, would violate. Maryland agreed to appropriate and did appropriate and expend $200,000 in clearing out and deepening harbors which the Government was bound to improve. In this act of 1825 there is the following provision:

"Provided, That before any part of the aforesaid subscriptions, except so much as is payable in the stock and debt of the Potomac Company, shall be made, or any part of the sum herein appropriated to execute the improvements contemplated by this act to be made on the low lands situated on the margins of the aforesaid rivers and creeks, or to execute the improvements of the Potomac, and North-east rivers be expended, the Congress of the United States shall by law authorize a subscription for not less than ten thousand shares of the capital stock of the eastern section of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, and shall enact a law expressly securing to the State of Maryland, and to any company incorporated or hereafter to be incorporated by the said State, the right to take and continue a canal from any point of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, through the territory of Columbia, or any part thereof, to the said State, in any direction it may deem proper."

The law which I have just read points out the mode and manner in which Maryland shall avail of the privileges granted in that law. It provides that the Governor shall call upon the President of the United States to appoint a commissioner with a view to the location of any such canal as Maryland may need or require.

Now, what did Congress do? By an act passed on the 3d of March, 1825, Congress ratifies, affirms, adopts, and makes law in the District of Columbia the charter passed originally by Virginia, and accepted and ratified by Maryland. Congress goes further, and in express terms accepts the proposition submitted by Maryland in the law from which I have just read. In accepting that charter Congress adopted the very phraseology I have read from the law of Virginia, and agreed that the waters of the Potomac should be reserved to the States of Maryland and Virginia for any future improvement that they might think proper to project. Then Congress, after confirming unqualifiedly and unconditionally this charter of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, in the second section of the law I hold in my hand, declares:

"Should the State of Virginia or Maryland desire at any time to avail itself of the right secured to it by the twenty-first section of the act aforesaid."

That is the very section I have read from, wherein Maryland made a proposition to the Government of the United States to expend $200,000 in clearing out the harbor on the margin of the north bank of the Potomac and on the Eastern Shore, which the Government of the United States was bound under the Constitution to do for the accommodation of the national ships, the coastwise trade, and the foreign commerce.

"Should the State of Virginia or Maryland desire at any time to avail itself of the right secured to it by the twenty-first section of the act aforesaid to take and continue a canal from any point of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to any other point within the territory of the District of Columbia, or through the same, on application to the President of the United States, by the Executive of the State, the President is authorized and empowered to depute three skillful commissioners of the United States corps of Engineers to survey and examine so much of the route of such canal as may affect in any manner the navigation of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal."

Under this power a canal to Alexandria has been made. Under this power the property has been created which gentlemen now propose to touch with unholy hands and to appropriate to a company of speculators. I do not speak this disrespectfully. Speculators are the pioneers in the great improvement of the country; but I want them to keep within legitimate boundaries and not trespass upon interests of Maryland that are of vital importance to my constituency, nor come before the Congress of the United States and ask a surrender of its honor and its pledged faith for their benefit.

I will refer to one other statute, because it may have been whispered in the ear of gentlemen who hear me that the charter of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company is forfeited. Why, sir, I have some knowledge of the history of that canal; I have examined all the laws on this subject. I will not trouble the House by referring to them all; it is not necessary. It is only necessary to refer to a single statute passed by Congress, and in the same words by the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, to find that the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company were released in 1845 from all forfeitures prior to that date, and were clothed with complete power under this charter, provided they finished their canal for transit to the town of Cumberland in 1855. And I know that the canal was completed within the requirement of that law, by 1850. So that there can be no pretense that their charter has ever been forfeited.

Now, let me ask, what has been done by the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, of which Maryland holds nearly all the stock, the Government of the United States holding but a very small portion? What has been done by the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company in pursuance of the authority with which that corporation was clothed? They have not only made a canal from the boundaries of the District of Columbia to the town of Cumberland, but they have extended that canal eastward through Georgetown to the Washington canal just about at the base of the mound upon which the National Observatory stands.

Now, what is proposed in this bill? It proposes to grant to a company of individuals, nine of the number, a majority of them, being non-residents of the District of Columbia, and none of them being residents of Maryland, not only the power to hold, occupy, possess, and enjoy, without paying for it, the Washington canal, but to hold, occupy, and possess all that part of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal that lies east of the western bank of Rock creek. That part of the canal members are not so familiar with. I therefore hope they will excuse me for dwelling upon particularities.

The canal company have built a dike between the river and Rock creek and formed a basin. They have constructed four very expensive canal locks immediately beyond Rock creek within the short distance of a quarter of a mile. They have built outside of the jurisdiction of the United States and inside of the jurisdiction of Maryland a dam across the Potomac river for a feeder for all the canals. The water from the river, after supplying certain factories, furnishes the means of reaching this basin at the mouth of Rock creek and then passes into the Washington canal.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. F. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. There are one or two provisions in this bill that I desire to call attention to, and then ask a question about it in view of some remarks made by the gentleman from Maryland. I understand the main objection that the gentleman makes to this bill is that it proposes to seize upon the property of another corporation to which the faith of this Government is pledged and from which the Government has received valuable considerations. Now, then, the gravity of such an objection as that must be obvious to everybody; and if the bill is justly liable to that objection it cannot well be passed by this House.

The suggestions which I desire to make, and upon which I wish to hear the gentleman from Maryland, are these: first, I understand the bill does not propose to seize any property except so far as it proposes that the Government, in its right of eminent domain, shall authorize the seizure of property by the corporation which the bill proposes to create. I suppose that the gentleman from Maryland, who is a distinguished lawyer, does not deny that it is competent for the Government of the United States, whenever it may create a corporation and confer these rights of eminent domain, to authorize the seizure, in virtue of that right, of any property, although it may be the property of a corporation. Now, is there anything else in the provisions of this bill than an authority bestowed by the Government of the United States upon a new corporation to take, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, the property of another corporation (assuming that this is the property of another corporation) upon paying for it. If this be so, then it seems to me to obviate most of the objections which are urged.

The other suggestion which I desire to make is based upon the seventeenth section of the bill, which provides—

That nothing in this act contained shall be held or deemed, in any manner or way, to injure or impair any public or private rights or interests, or in any manner to affect the same beyond the mere transfer of the rights of the United States to said District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company.

In other words, so far as this bill attempts to do anything beyond the authorization of the exercise of the right of eminent domain and of payment for property taken under it, the bill only proposes to quit-claim whatever interests the Government may have.

Mr. F. THOMAS. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] had waited five minutes—for I am hurrying on in this discussion, knowing that it is not generally interesting to the House; but I know that my constituents would never forgive me if I were not faithful to their interests on this occasion—if the gentleman had waited a few minutes, I would have anticipated the very suggestion which he makes, and would have convinced even his clear mind that this bill cannot be passed with any propriety, even should I concede, as I do not, all the positions taken by the gentleman from Ohio.

First, let me say the gentleman from Ohio seems to have overlooked the fact that the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia nullified, by an amendment of a very few words, the very section which the Senate inserted out of abundant caution. The section sets forth that nothing shall be affected by the act but the rights and interests of the United States. The amendment nullifies all that by inserting the words "except as hereinbefore provided;" and I shall show presently, if I have time, what was "hereinbefore provided."

But, Mr. Speaker, let the gentleman from Ohio bear in mind that that part of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal proposed to be seized, east of the west bank of Rock creek, cost only about one hundred and six or one hundred and eight thousand dollars; and if the parties under this most anomalous bill are called on to pay this amount, what becomes of the investments of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, amounting to $500,000 more, expended beyond the west boundary of Rock creek, expended in the construction of canal locks, four in number, and bridges over the canal, four in number; what becomes of that investment? These corporations are not to pay for it. They are to seize as a mere locality that part of the property which they need. They are to appropriate to their purposes that part of the canal which lies east of the western bank of Rock creek. They are to estop the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company from the opportunity of getting into the basin at Rock creek, and of passing out into the river Potomac or into the Washington canal. They are not to pay the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company for their investment beyond that point. No one will suppose that this company is to be remunerated on an expenditure of nearly half a million dollars by collecting toll upon the articles transported upon the canal for a quarter of a mile.

Again, this company now proposed are not required, and Congress cannot authorize them, to go inside of the boundaries of the State of Maryland and take possession of and pay for the dam across the river Potomac beyond Georgetown, within the jurisdiction of the State of Maryland, without which the Washington canal will be of no value; without which this grant will not be worth the paper upon which it is written. Congress is to interpose with a high-handed authority and give this new company the right to condemn all that part of the work which the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company have made up to a certain point, giving this new company the advantages of all the structures up to that point; while those beyond that point cannot be of any exclusive advantage to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company. And the commerce of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company cannot pass that dam and reach a market without paying toll to this new company.

I think that this ought to be considered an answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio. My mind had swept round that comparatively small matter in this case; and I had intended to develop it in the course of my remarks. But gentlemen will excuse me for saying that I do not consider this trespass upon the vested rights of the corporation of which I have spoken the only violation in this case of what I call the pledged faith of this Government.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that if I could look at this Washington canal through the medium of the functionaries who for the time being are at the head of the local government of Washington, I would not utter one word in their defense; they might find a defender elsewhere. For I disapprove emphatically and decidedly of their whole career, more especially of the recent course of their mayor, this "captain of a pinnacle," who undertook to hector and lecture the representatives of five and twenty million people because they did not happen to coincide with him in political opinion. If I could be governed by such considerations, I would not say one word in defense of the vested rights of this city in the Washington canal.

But I do not look at the question in that light. I do not allow differences of opinion to degenerate with me into personal animosities. I do not permit the false steps of the representative for the time being of a community to prejudice that community in my judgment. I look beyond such considerations. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company may be governed by gentlemen who are by no means in accord with my political views. Washington city is governed for the time being by corporate officers who, I admit, are not exactly in accord with my views. I look beyond that. Why, sir, we might say of the representatives of these corporations as Banquo said of the witches when they disappeared upon the heath without answering Macbeth's interrogatories:

"The earth hath bubbles, as the water has,
And these are of them."

I look at communities, I look at Washington city, the great commercial emporium of the district I represent, nearly as much identified with the interests of a large portion of the district I represent as the boasted, and I am proud to say justly boasted, commercial emporium of Maryland, Baltimore. I look forward to the day when half a million, nay a million, of people may be located upon these wide plains so beautifully prepared by nature for the erection of an immense city. And why not? We see Paris standing upon the banks of the Seine, a river inferior to the Potomac for commercial purposes. We see London on the banks of the Thames, a river inferior to the Potomac for commercial purposes. We have, as all know, access to cheap fuel for this city, one of the most important elements in building up a large city; and our access to this inexhaustible supply of fuel is by means of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal. When, therefore, I speak of the question which I am about to open up, I speak of it with reference to the future, not with reference to Mayor Wallach, of Washington; not with reference to any of the present functionaries of this city. Certainly I entertain respect for Mayor Wallach personally. He is an accomplished gentleman, courteous in every particular. My conflict is with the opinions, not with the man.

Now, sir, I say I look to the day when this is to be a great city, when this canal is to pour into this great city the agricultural productions of one of the most highly cultivated and fertile regions of country in the whole Union; when this canal is to pour into this city all the productions of that magnificent valley of Virginia, stretching from Harper's Ferry to Staunton; I look to that day and I act on these questions in reference to such a day. The boy is now born who may see one million people settled round this common center of one common Government.

I will pass to some other points, as it is my design to be as brief as possible. I have examined the laws touching this Washington canal, and I find no mention made in Maryland legislation until 1795. It is there spoken of as an existing work. It would be right to infer from that law that it was built by private enterprise and by private capital. I see at the head of the parties to whom the Legislature of Maryland in 1795 gave the right to raise $50,000 by lottery, Daniel Carroll of Duddington; and I know he was one of the proprietors of the land upon which this city was built. That charter authorizes those who began the canal and nearly built it to raise $50,000 by a lottery. When this law was passed Congress allowed Maryland to exercise jurisdiction here before the seat of Government had been removed from Philadelphia.

The next law referring to this canal is the act of Congress of 1802, by which Congress gave a charter to the same identical individuals to whom the lottery had been granted, and gave them corporate power; and then, in 1812, Congress gave to the same individuals the right to raise money by lottery for the completion of the canal, as authorized by the act of Maryland of 1795.

I will not trouble the House by reciting the subsequent acts, but it is enough in this narrative to say that subsequent to that date the corporate authorities of Washington bought the original property right of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, and his coöperators, who had complied with all the requirements of their charter, and had cut and opened the canal. The interest of each individual stockholder was purchased by the corporation of Washington in 1832, with the consent of Congress. Congress then passed all the laws necessary to vest that property in the authorities of Washington. The authorities here obtained it without any aid from the General Government whatever.

At that time the canal terminated at the base of the mound on which this Capitol stands. Much of the stone used in the center building of the old Capitol was transported on that canal for the convenience of the Government. The botanical garden and the propagating garden of the Agricultural Bureau, now lying outside of the inclosure of this Capitol, were then a morass, and the land was valueless. Congress passed a law authorizing the city of Washington to appropriate for its own uses any land it might redeem by changing the location of the canal to its present site.

The city of Washington incurred an expense from the commencement to the conclusion of this work of $377,000. Washington city incurred the expense with a change of the locality of the canal. Subsequently an arrangement was entered into by which Washington surrendered to Congress all claim and title to the redeemed land I have mentioned on condition that Congress would furnish money to aid in the completion of the canal.

I know much has been said outside of the House, and it may be said inside of the House, about the aid the Government has furnished to the authorities of Washington. I beg gentlemen to bear in mind this aid was not a donation, a free offering, a gift without consideration by the United States. The original proprietors gave the Government much of the ground upon which Washington now stands.

I remember thirty years ago, when this subject was analyzed and examined, but I do not intend to pause long on this point. A debit and credit account was started charging the Government of the United States for every dollar they had received from public lands, the donation to the Government by the original proprietors, and crediting the Government with every dollar expended by it within the jurisdiction of this corporation, and the balance was largely in favor of the city of Washington.

Suppose this had been a free-will offering; suppose it was a donation made by the Government of the United States to this city to aid in completing this canal, should it be reclaimed by Congress wantonly, without just cause, in mere caprice; and to give it to whom? To the people of the United States? No. But some ten, fifteen, or sixteen speculators here who are pressing upon us and trying to "dragoon" this House of Representatives so as to get possession of this large grant.

There is a section in this bill, Mr. Speaker, which directs, points out, and prescribes the mode and manner in which real estate in this District may be taken by these corporators and appropriated to their corporate purposes, which is in itself very objectionable, but that does not cover the point to which I shall presently refer. It is objectionable because it is in direct conflict with the provision of the Constitution of the United States which guarantees to every citizen the right of trial by jury where an amount equal to twenty dollars is in dispute. It is in conflict with the bill of rights of the State of Maryland, which is in force here, and which grants trial by jury to every citizen.

In reference to the condemning of real estate for corporate uses, the law of Maryland, in accord with this bill of rights, requires that there shall be not only a fair hearing, but hearing by a jury. The judges of the circuit court are authorized by this bill to appoint commissioners, who are authorized to value all property, other than the Washington canal, required for this new canal company; and if the judges do not like the report a new commission is to be appointed, and thus commission after commission is to be appointed until the judges are satisfied. Judges who have no knowledge of the locality are thus to assess the damages. They are to have the whole power under this bill, and the great right of trial by jury secured to us by the Constitution of the United States and the bill of rights of Maryland is ignored. These judges have the sole right to repudiate every valuation submitted for their approval until they meet with one that has their sanction. That is the provision of one section of this bill; and then there is another section very curiously put in another part of the bill which authorizes the taking of this Washington canal, from the mouth of Tiber creek to the Potomac river, without paying one dollar for it. The bill will show that I am right. Is there to be found anywhere such a grant in the laws of any country governed by a written constitution?

Why, sir, if the Washington city corporation have forfeited the grant that Congress gave them in 1832, are they not entitled to a trial before you execute your writ? Are they not entitled to a quo warranto from a court of justice? Have they not a right to examine witnesses, to try the issue, whether they have forfeited their grant or not? Is it becoming in a Congress of the United States, without a hearing, to take $377,000 of property in this canal owned by this city and give it to a few individuals who are non-residents of the city, who will incur none of the responsibility of paying the debts that this corporation has incurred?

Sir, I would dwell much longer on this subject, but I pass it by. I know that there is a prejudice in the minds of members of Congress against the canal company of Washington on account of the manner in which they have exercised the powers and privileges granted to them. I know the city has been reproached about the condition of that canal, inside of its limits, which it is proposed now to give to this new company.

But let me say a word or two in extenuation, which I believe will find a response in the heart of every unprejudiced man who hears me. The Chesapeake and Ohio canal was originally badly constructed inside of the limits of Georgetown. The bridges crossing the canal were built too low. A loaded boat sinking deep in the water would pass under them to the Rock creek basin, but unloaded would float on the surface and could not return. Then it was the capitalists of western Maryland, interested in the coal trade, resorted to another outlet. They built a great aqueduct, aided by Congress, across the Potomac, at Georgetown, and a canal to Alexandria, at a cost of $1,250,000. They built wharves at Alexandria from which they could ship coal with convenience, but, sir, this aqueduct was found by the chief of the quartermaster's department to be indispensable to his purposes during the war. It was seized by the Government and used as a bridge for transporting supplies, &c., to McClellan's army. That bridge has not been surrendered to this hour. All the means, therefore, for the transportation of coal and produce on the bosom of that canal are still appropriated to the use of the United States.

Seeing this obstruction to the trade of the canal, I turned my eyes in another direction for an outlet, and in the last Congress obtained an appropriation, with the sanction of the Secretary of War, of $13,000, to be expended in elevating these bridges. These gentlemen now making application for the surrender of this Washington canal to them, appreciate the importance of that improvement as giving an outlet for the trade of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to pass into the Washington canal. It is now proposed they shall have this part of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal and the Washington canal without paying interest on investments that have been lying unprofitable for twenty years.

These gentlemen of course saw another thing, and I saw it. Why, sir, I would maintain the bold proposition, and expect to have a fair hearing on it, that it is the duty of Congress to give to the Ohio and Chesapeake canal a new outlet, since the Government has appropriated the old outlet to its purposes. Yet we ask nothing of that kind; we only ask to be let alone, "hands off," for there is a value in this property now which will develop itself. But I saw, and saw at once, and these gentlemen saw, the immense change that is to be produced in the country which I represent, and in this city too, by the elevation of these bridges enabling that trade to come here, and the boats to be unloaded on the banks of this Washington canal. I foresee what a relief that will be to this commerce. And if any gentleman wants to understand it, I invite him to go to Georgetown and see the wretched fixtures there for the accommodation of this trade.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BEAMAN.) The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. COBB resumed the floor.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COBB] will yield to me, I will move that the time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] be extended.

Mr. COBB. I have no objection to the House granting as much time as the gentleman may desire. I only desire to bring the matter to a vote this afternoon.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move that the gentleman from Maryland have time to conclude his remarks.

No objection was made.

Mr. F. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, the House

knows enough of my personal practices to be aware that I reluctantly take any part in the discussions of this House unless there is a stern necessity for so doing. They know very well that I leave the general debate to other gentlemen; they know enough of their own inclinations to be aware that no man from choice makes a speech upon such a subject as I am now discussing. They know that upon the immediate Representative of the locality most interested must devolve the whole labor of explaining to members of this House all the bearings of this subject. On that account I accept the offer made by the House, grateful for its kindness in allowing me to make a very few more observations.

I am never personal anywhere. I can differ substantially and fundamentally and radically with any man, even if it shall be upon a question involving the principles which lie at the foundation of a Government that I love with such deep enthusiasm as I do that under which I have grown up to manhood, without permitting those differences of opinion to degenerate into anything like personal animosities and discussions. I know how difficult it is to form a completely impartial judgment upon any subject. I know how difficult it is "where self the wavering balance shakes to have it right adjusted." I believe the gentlemen urging the passage of this bill have honest convictions, and I hope they will tolerate my zeal and earnestness in resisting what I call practically a robbery of my constituents in a matter so vitally important to them in the present, and promising to be of so much value in the future.

Let me here refer to one more point. Persons seem to be amazed that Maryland should have made so enormous an expenditure as $17,000,000 with a view to open communication with the coal regions of Alleghany. It grows out of the fact that the Legislature assumed that to be done which can be done. They assumed that two million tons of coal would be forthwith floating on the Chesapeake and Ohio canal when it should be opened up to the town of Cumberland. They did not stop to estimate how long it would take to locate a population there, to take them away from other inviting adventures and enterprises to mine so much coal there; they did not see how long it would take to make the necessary railroads, to make the necessary shafts, to put up all the necessary dwellings. In short, they did not foresee what a length of time must elapse before that investment would become valuable. But now the gentlemen seeking this charter know perfectly well that an annual trade which has recovered from the pressure of the war in three years from ninety-four thousand tons to three hundred and forty-six thousand tons, will not be very long in reaching two million tons, and then not reach the full capacity of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal for transportation. They know that this city is growing with great rapidity. I assume that they know, for they are shrewd and intelligent gentlemen, that the coal consumed in the District of Columbia is about one hundred and thirty thousand tons annually. They know that now, by reason of this obstruction in Georgetown to the coal trade of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, one hundred thousand of those one hundred and thirty thousand tons are brought from the remote mines in the State of Pennsylvania, coming in competition with the Cumberland coal. They know that every ton of coal landed on the banks of the canal in Georgetown costs $1 50 additional for cartage into this city, whether it be needed at the navy-yard, the arsenal, or other public buildings, or by private individuals. They see that when that policy shall have been accomplished which was inaugurated in the last Congress, of elevating those bridges and allowing the free passage of the loaded boats underneath the bridges into this Washington canal, and allowing them to unload at the navy-yard, near to the arsenal on the banks of the canal, in less than two years thereafter the coal furnished by the miners of the county of Alleghany, instead of furnishing thirty thousand out of the one hundred and thirty thousand tons now consumed in this city, will, perhaps, monopolize the whole business of furnishing fuel for this great city.

For this reason they now step in with this proposition. Do they propose to pay interest on past expenditures? No; not a dollar. Do they propose to remunerate the corporation of Washington for the $377,000 of dead capital invested in the canal? Not a dollar. They are to obtain their privileges by an absolute grant, which any court in this country ought to rule as a nullity; for in a Government like ours, a Government of written constitutions containing guarantees of vested rights and private rights, no judicial authority, I hope, will ever carry into effect any law that proposes to absorb $377,000 worth of property without a trial, without a hearing, and to give it to individuals for their own private advantage.

I will not dwell longer on that subject. I will only say that I look forward to the day when Washington shall have a greatly increased population; when the Government of the United States will need, even more than it now needs, fuel from the Alleghany region; when this city will require hundreds of thousands of tons of coal for manufacturing purposes; when our naval vessels will approach the wharves here at the Eastern branch for the purpose of getting their supplies, secure from the interference of any foreign enemy. I see all this in the future. These gentlemen see it, too; and I am now endeavoring to stand between them and the attempt to appropriate all these prospective advantages for their own private purposes, to the very great detriment of the State of Maryland.

That State, permit me to say, has acted with great disinterestedness and great nobility on this subject; for in making this canal without the aid of the local government, which the Government of the United States is for the District of Columbia, they are pouring wealth into a foreign jurisdiction; they are helping to build up here a city as a rival of Baltimore. This city is, of course, beyond the limits of the taxing power of that State, and every dollar of wealth poured from the counties which I represent—the Potomac counties of Maryland—is a subtraction from the amount that would be poured into the commercial emporium of our State, thus helping to fill the coffers of our treasury.

Under these circumstances I will leave the question where it now stands—hoping that the House will excuse the desultory manner in which I have discussed it—until I hear from gentlemen on the other side; and I hope that the House will then afford me an opportunity to correct any errors of fact that may occur in the course of the discussion. I certainly should not have trespassed to such an extent upon the courtesy of the House if any other gentleman on this floor felt the same interest in this question which I feel, and would have performed the duty which I feel conscientiously called upon to perform.

Mr. COBB. I presume that the House is not desirous of hearing a very protracted discussion on this subject, and I shall consume no more time than may seem absolutely necessary. But before going further, I desire to ask the previous question on the motion to reconsider the votes by which the amendments to this bill were heretofore agreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it in order at this time to move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until the first Monday of December next?

The SPEAKER. The motion is not now in order, as the main question has been ordered.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider the votes by which the various amendments were adopted, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendments, and they were rejected.

The SPEAKER then stated that the bill was before the House as in the printed form, and the question was on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. COBB. I hope that the House and the Chair will overlook any little irregularities in the manner of presenting the matter, inasmuch as the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] who has heretofore had the management of this bill, is now absent.

I did not enjoy the privilege of being present at the discussion which took place some two or three weeks ago between the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.] I did come into the Hall just as the gentleman from Maryland was concluding his remarks, just as the morning hour expired, and I naturally supposed that he had been occupying the floor during the whole of that hour. If I have misrepresented him in this respect I cheerfully make the amende honorable.

Now, sir, I do not intend to weary the patience of this House by following or attempting to follow the arguments of the gentleman from Maryland in opposition to this bill. I will make but a few remarks, when I will yield the floor to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WELKER,] or any other member of the committee who desires to be heard on this subject. At the expiration of my hour I propose to call the previous question and to let the House take such action on this bill as may be deemed proper.

The gentleman from Maryland opposes this bill in the interest of his constituents. He informed the House that to pass this bill would be, in his opinion, a direct robbery of his constituents. Certainly, sir, if that be the fact I, as well, I believe, as all the other members of the committee, have labored under the grave misrepresentation of the facts by the action we have taken. This matter was pretty thoroughly discussed in the committee by all the parties who desired to be heard in opposition to it. Among others, it was discussed by the gentleman from Maryland. I must confess that the views he expressed in the House to-day are in great part new to me. We also heard the objections urged on the part of the city authorities, as well as on the part of some citizens of Washington. I believe all these objections were fully and fairly considered by that committee. I believe that no member of that committee felt any desire to do injustice to the city authorities or to the gentleman's constituents. Nor, sir, do I believe that committee has been actuated by any feeling of animosity to the city authorities or to the honorable mayor on account of political principles, or by any other consideration than that growing out of the merits of the case. Certainly, so far as I am myself concerned, I can say that no such feeling has actuated me.

As has been already said on this floor, about the first object to which the attention of the Committee for the District of Columbia was called on our appointment at this Congress was the condition of the Washington city canal; that it had become unmanageable to the city authorities; that they did not possess the means of properly keeping it so as to prevent it becoming a cause of sickness and probably contagion in the midst of the city; that the limited means of the city would not enable them to put it in proper condition, and it was therefore desired that the Federal Government should take it out of their hands. That was most industriously pressed upon the committee for a considerable length of time; that it was a great nuisance in the midst of the city; that the city was unable to take care of it, and that the Federal Government must make an appropriation of considerable magnitude in order to prevent its continuing to be a great nuisance.

Among the various propositions on this subject—and there were a good many made or suggested—one was this: to take this off the hands of the Government upon the terms set forth in this charter. Now, sir, I for one am a little cautious about entertaining these propositions to charter companies on the part of Congress.

I do not favor them. I believe it is the duty of Congress to reject nearly all that are presented here. Among them all I believe this is the only one that I have favored in committee or am likely to vote for in Congress. But as a sanitary measure, proposing to remove this great nuisance and to enable this great city to take care of a public work which they have on their hands but which they never ought to have been burdened with, I surrendered what objection I had to voting for a private corporation incorporated by the last Congress, and particularly because from its very nature its operations would be confined in a territorial point of view to the District of Columbia.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the prominent argument embraced in the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. F. THOMAS,] the argument to which all others seemed to tend, and the one which had been made before the Committee for the District of Columbia, not only by that gentleman, but by a great many others, seems to be this: that you propose to grant this franchise to a foreign corporation. The changes have been rung on that word "foreign," not only here, but in the committee, until it has satisfied me at least that it is the chief objection to this bill.

If these corporators were citizens of Maryland, of the gentleman's district; or still better, if they were citizens of the District of Columbia; or still better than all, if they were of a favorite class of citizens—the Carrolls, for instance—some of those old historical people, I do not think you would have heard much objection to the passage of this bill. But they have the misfortune, I believe, to be citizens of New York, Pennsylvania, and some other States; and hence their presumption in coming before Congress and asking for an act of incorporation, particularly if by that act of incorporation they obtain the right to disturb some of the soil of this District, strikes the mind of certain gentlemen on this floor and elsewhere with very great horror.

Now, sir, in regard to the claim of vested rights which this Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, or the States of Virginia and Maryland, have in this old canal, I think it either goes too far or falls short of what gentlemen expect of it. We do not propose by this act of incorporation to interfere with any of the rights of corporations. We do not come in and say that they shall not form whatever connections they please with this canal on one hand or the other. There are no exclusive privileges granted in this bill that I am aware of. It only grants to these men the right to dig a canal.

I suppose the gentleman's argument would go to this extent, that the Government of the United States was bound for all time to come to refrain from doing any act or setting up any work or anything anywhere which could by any possibility come in the way of any future extension which this Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company might choose to make. Most certainly such is not a fair interpretation of the law which the gentleman himself read.

We have no objection, and this bill raises none in any respect, to the Government of the United States keeping faith in this compact, as the gentleman calls it, with Maryland and Virginia. But certainly when the Government established this Capitol or the Treasury building it was not infringing upon vested rights. At the same time, I do not suppose the gentleman would claim that it would be proper for that canal company to run its extension through the grounds set apart for the Capitol of the nation. So I do not think that that argument ought to have any great weight with members of this House in their action in regard to this bill.

There is one thing which I think must strike members of the House as noticeable. This canal running through the city of Washington was first projected about seventy years ago. It has been in some state of operation for nearly that length of time. The Chesapeake and Ohio canal has been built over thirty years. This opportunity for extending its canal through the city of Washington has existed during all of that time. It is supposed that some years ago there was considerably more business done in this portion of the country than there is now. If I have not been misinformed the business of Washington and of the adjoining country, and particularly of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, was formerly vastly greater than it is now. I believe the bordering country, with its towns and cities, did a greater business, and had a greater amount of transportation, twenty years ago than it now does or is likely to do for a considerable time to come, judging of coming events by the shadows they cast before. And still this vast opportunity for running coal down to tide-water and for making profitable a desirable investment has lain here entirely neglected and unnoticed, not only by the gentleman's constituents, but by the citizens of this District and city. I am told that for fifteen years this canal has lain entirely neglected, acknowledged on all hands to be a seething pool of corruption in the midst of a considerable city, without any effort being made on the part of capitalists or anybody else to improve it for navigable purposes or take care of it and prevent its remaining dangerous to the public health.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maryland takes exception to the tenth section of the bill in regard to the form in which this company is authorized to condemn property. I do not pretend to be posted on the peculiar laws of this District. The bill of rights of which the gentleman speaks I suppose is one of the heirlooms left to the people of this District by the government of Maryland. I know that it is one of a class of questions which have caused a considerable amount of dissension. I do not think, however, that the gentleman's conclusion is correct that any portion of the constitution of Maryland can have the effect in the District of Columbia to make so fair and so equitable a provision as this unconstitutional and void. If it would be void as an enactment, I need not say to the gentleman, or to any member of this House, that being void it would be entirely harmless. But if not void it is then a fair and equitable provision. It is exactly such a clause as is usually put in acts of incorporation throughout the northern and western States on the subject of condemning property for the purposes of constructing railroads and canals.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Whether this bill does not give absolute authority to this corporation to take in fee or absolutely all the interest or any portion of the interest of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, and if that is taken away whether the right of control is not absolutely in the company hereby created. Does it not take away the right of the existing company to that portion of the canal constructed by them which the company may desire to use?

Mr. COBB. I was coming to that. I will read two sections of the bill, one of which was read by the gentleman from Maryland, and which it was claimed had the effect the gentleman speaks of:

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That in order to aid the said District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company in fulfilling the objects and requirements of this act, the use of that part of the Washington canal, and bridges crossing said canal, for the purposes aforesaid, between the junction of Virginia avenue and a point near the foot of Seventeenth street west, at the mouth of Tiber creek, and for the width of seventy feet, to be determined by a line drawn through the center of said canal or channel and extended therefrom on either side thirty-five feet, be, and the same are hereby, vested in the said District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company, to have and to hold the same for the use and benefit of the said company.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be held or deemed, in any manner or way, to injure or impair any public or private rights or interests, or in any manner to affect the same beyond the mere transfer of the rights of the United States to said District of Columbia Canal and Sewerage Company.

The section last read will answer the gentleman's question, I think.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask whether one of the amendments incorporated in this bill, at the end of section seventeen, does not say "except as hereinbefore provided;" and whether that exception does not give the entire right of which I speak? I have the bill here with the amendments passed by the House.

The SPEAKER. The amendments have all been reconsidered.

Mr. COBB. They have all been reconsidered and the bill stands just as it originally was. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, all that this bill proposes to do is to grant the right which this Government has in the property. If the Government does not own it, it does not grant it. If the Government has no right to reclaim and take possession of it, then it grants nothing. If the Government has that right, I respectfully submit to this House that it is the most economical manner of disposing of this matter, as it is the only proposition, of the many which have been made, or which are likely to be made, that will cost the Government no money.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COBB] if he can furnish any precedent, when a corporation created by law has failed to perform all the duties for which it was organized within the time specified, where the Government has proceeded to take away the franchise thus granted when the company was ready to proceed.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] will show me a precedent where a company has so entirely failed to carry out the object for which it was organized, and has allowed the grant to remain unused to an extent detrimental not only to the commercial interests but to the health of the people, and still has been allowed to go on, then I will undertake to show him the precedent to which he alludes.

I now propose to yield a part of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WELKER.]

Mr. F. THOMAS. Before the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COBB] does that, will he yield to me a few moments?

Mr. COBB. For what purpose?

Mr. F. THOMAS. I want to set the gentleman right on one point. I did not interrupt him while speaking.

Mr. COBB. How long a time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. F. THOMAS. Not more than five minutes, I think.

Mr. COBB. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I am much indebted to the gentleman for his courtesy. I desire to explain why it happens that I did not appear before the Committee for the District of Columbia and there unfold what I have said here today. In March last I offered a resolution instructing the Committee for the District of Columbia to inquire into the expediency of making an arrangement by which the Washington canal could be made a part of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal. And I asked the chairman of that committee to give me a hearing whenever the matter came up before the committee for consideration. But I never received any intimation that my presence before that committee would be acceptable. Accidentally I learned that commissioners had been appointed to examine into the condition of this Washington canal, with a view to making it a sanitary institution and also with a view to its commercial capabilities. I had an interview with those commissioners, and they told me what their report would be as to the improvement necessary to prevent that canal giving out any noxious malaria. And I knew the city of Washington, through its corporate authorities, was engaged in carrying into effect the recommendation of these engineers. And I have been waiting for the other report of these engineers, setting forth in a scientific manner what should be done to make this Washington canal a continuation of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal. And while thus waiting, to my surprise this bill was thrown before this House for action.

Now, that is the history of the whole affair. But I did go before the Committee for the District of Columbia. Having accidentally learned that this matter was before them for consideration, I made my appearance there, and made a very few comments; I felt very awkwardly situated there; I had not been invited to appear before them, and I went there very reluctantly, for I did not know but I might be regarded as an intruder there.

Now, one word more. The gentleman does great injustice to Maryland and to one of her humble Representatives here, in supposing that we have any objection to a legitimate and fair application of capital from any quarter of the earth to the development of the valuable but latent resources of any part of our State. The very gentlemen who are seeking this grant from Congress, obtained from the State of Maryland, with my approbation, the right to make a canal from Washington city to the city of Annapolis, if they thought proper to expend their capital for that purpose. Now, with this statement, I think the gentleman must be perfectly satisfied that I am utterly incapable of so narrow an idea as to resist an improvement merely on account of the source from whence the funds for it are to be derived.

Mr. COBB. In reply to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. F. THOMAS,] I will say that I derived this idea of a foreign corporation partly from the gentleman's own remarks, and partly from the statements of the representatives of the city. In regard to the gentleman appearing before the Committee for the District of Columbia, I of course knew nothing of any arrangement with the chairman. I knew that the gentleman was before the committee; and I think I am not mistaken when I say that not only the chairman, but every other member of the committee, treated him with respect and listened with attention to his argument, though doubtless some of us felt some astonishment at some of the propositions which the gentleman submitted. As I understood him at that time, his opposition to this bill was based upon a more extended and comprehensive ground than the argument which he now presents.

I now yield the floor to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WELKER.]

Mr. WELKER. Mr. Speaker, this question is not a new one in the Congress of the United States. For a great number of years it has come before Congress in different ways for different purposes. The form in which it presents itself at this time is this: there passes through the city of Washington an old canal, which everybody admits to be a nuisance, and hence the question arises, what are we to do with it? Shall we fill it up or shall we expend the public money in order to abate the nuisance and to improve it for some purpose or other? This bill comes to the House from the Senate, having passed that body, and is designed for the accomplishment of these purposes: first, a sanitary purpose—to get rid of what is admitted to be a nuisance to the city of Washington; second, to furnish a sewerage; and third, a navigable canal for the city. For twenty-five or thirty years this old canal has been a common cess-pool for this city, and for perhaps the last fifteen or twenty years it has been the receptacle of the sewerage of the city of Washington so that it is now found to be, as I have remarked, a great nuisance, pressing earnestly upon us the question, what shall we do with it?

This bill proposes to organize a canal and sewerage company with this threefold object. In the first place, the sanitary purpose should interest us all. It had been decided by the board of health of this city that this canal was a nuisance, and that if it be not abated in some form or other it would invite the cholera during the approaching heated season. The first object, then, of the bill is to get rid of this nuisance for the purpose of bringing about a better sanitary condition.

The next proposition is to make a common sewerage for the city. All admit that it is necessary for a great city like Washington that there should be a common system of sewerage, and this is provided for in the bill. How? This company is required to dig this canal ten feet deep and to put running water through it within a certain period of time, so as to remove the impurities which now render the canal so detrimental to health. By this means a first-class sewerage will be provided for the city of Washington.

In the next place, the bill has a commercial view, being designed to make a navigable canal through the city for commercial purposes. It is said to be very desirable to the interests of the city of Washington that this improvement should be made and thus afford easy access for coal as well as other trade to the city.

But it is said by the gentleman from Maryland that by incorporating this company we shall deprive the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company of rights which they are entitled to enjoy; and he also urges that by the provisions of the bill we undertake to seize a great property or franchise now owned by the city of Washington, the old Washington canal. Now, so far as the canal is concerned, this bill simply proposes to give to this company whatever rights the General Government has in that canal. It undertakes to give no other right. If this Government has no right in this canal, this company will receive no interest under the provisions of this bill. The bill does not undertake to settle the ownership of this old canal. It does not determine whether the city or the Government owns it. If the Government owns it, it gives its use to the company. If the city owns it, then it only confers the right upon this company of ordinary condemnation of private property for this class of improvements.

So far as concerns the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, the bill does provide that this company proposed to be incorporated may construct a canal and sewerage along or near the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal for a short distance on the west of Seventeenth street up to the line of the corporate limits of Georgetown.

It is provided in the bill that this company may go through this part of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, or along the side thereof, or near it, and make a connection with that canal at Georgetown. If, however, they do use it, they are bound to pay for it, just as they are compelled to make compensation under this section for any other property they may see proper to take with a view to the completion of this canal. Now, it is a notorious fact that for nine or ten years that part of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal has not been used. On the contrary, it has been allowed to go to waste and destruction. It has been useless for all purposes of navigation. If it had been so valuable as the gentleman says it was during that period it strikes me they would have improved it, or at least have kept it in repair.

Now, this bill does not undertake to cede or take from any one any rights in any other way than by condemnation in the manner provided in the bill. The gentleman from Maryland says in the Constitution of the United States there is no authority to make an assessment of damages which may result from condemnation of property as provided in this bill. The gentleman will no doubt remember that under the Constitution in many of the States property is condemned under like provisions to those in this bill. Until the new constitution of Ohio was adopted, much of the property condemned for railroads and canals of that State was condemned under commissions similar to the one here provided. There may be objection to the mode of assessment, but there is certainly no constitutional objection to the assessment in this way.

Mr. DAVIS. In the legislation of other States, so far as I know, where any right is given to one corporation to connect with another corporation, provision is made for a joint commission to come to terms of agreement in respect to the use of the property of one corporation by that of another. In this bill I find a provision standing boldly upon its front that this corporation shall have the right to divest the former corporation of its property in this canal.

Mr. WELKER. No further than that part of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal which has been unused for nine or ten years. I admit that by the terms of the bill this company by paying for it may pursue the same line or go outside of it or inside of it as they may judge best and proper when they come to make their canal. If they take the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal then they have to pay damages to be assessed by these commissioners. I admit that the legislation of the different States, in respect to railroad and canal companies making connections and joint occupation, usually provides for a joint commission, but that is a subject-matter of contract and arrangement as well as legislation.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me inquire whether there is in this bill a provision for any remaining right of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal.

Mr. WELKER. There is no such provision in the bill. If this company cannot get a line near the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, they are to be allowed to avail themselves of that part of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal between Seventeenth street and Georgetown, so long unused, and for which damages are to be assessed and paid.

So far as the Washington city canal is concerned, it has not been used for twenty-five or thirty years, except a very small part of it. The General Government have already expended upon it at different times $190,000. On three occasions $150,000 was appropriated by the Government; at another time, in 1849, $20,000; and in 1851 $20,000, making in all $190,000 that this Government has already spent on this canal; and we find it still a nuisance upon our hands.

When Congress assembled, the Committee for the District of Columbia was called upon to make provision against the cholera, which might be engendered here in consequence of this canal. The corporate authorities of the city of Washington ask you to allow them to expend $75,000 to make temporary and sanitary improvements of this canal. They have gone on and expended a large sum for mere temporary improvement, and probably Congress at its next session will be called upon to pay the expenses. It really is worth nothing in a pecuniary point of view to the city of Washington, if owned and to be kept up by the city, for it will cost three or four hundred thousand dollars to put it in repair. If it had been a valuable franchise to the city, would this canal have been allowed to go without repair and entirely useless for so long a time? Now, if the city of Washington ever expects to derive any commercial advantage from this canal let them take it from under the control of the corporate authorities. Who ever heard of a municipal corporation running a railroad or canal to any purpose? The business of everybody is said to be the business of nobody; and a city that undertakes to run a canal for commercial purposes will find out that it is an unprofitable investment. Private corporations can always manage this class of improvements to much better advantage to all concerned.

The people of the city ought not to be taxed to keep up this nuisance. What is proposed? It is to authorize and allow this private company to make this a navigable canal, and require it to furnish this sewerage for the city of Washington, and relieve the Government of any more expense in relation to it.

Gentlemen will remember that in all these improvements in Washington the Government pays about one half the expense. The people of Washington expect us to pay half the expense of grading their streets. They expect us also to pay about the same proportion of the expense to provide them with an efficient system of sewerage. We have undertaken to do so by this bill. This is the best system of sewerage that has occurred to the committee, or to anybody else in Washington, during this session of Congress. Here is a bill which will afford to the city complete and adequate sewerage, and without any expense to the Government. Here is an opportunity to get rid of this nuisance, and also to get a good and practical system of sewerage, with a good navigable connection with the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, by which coal may be brought down and delivered at the wharves in Washington. We now have an opportunity of getting all the advantages without contributing a single dollar of the public money. Shall we not take advantage of the means of accomplishing all these objects, especially when we can do it without injury to the parties interested in opposition to this bill?

Mr. F. THOMAS. The House ought not to fall under a misapprehension upon one point to which the gentleman has referred. I trust they will excuse me for trespassing so often upon their attention, for the reason that there is no member here who has so much interest in this local affair as I have. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] has borrowed from me, and now has in his possession, a report from an engineer showing that the canal in the District of Columbia has been finished almost up to the point required by the engineer appointed by the War Department. It has been finished under a contract between the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company and the corporation of Washington; and the company have turned the water at Rock creek through this canal.

Further work, with the view to make this canal a commercial highway, has been postponed at the instance of the engineers of the War Department. It is well known that the ground which terminates at the base of the mound where the Capitol stands, and where the Government propagating garden is, was one continuous marsh. By changing the direction of the canal the city of Washington has redeemed certain lands.

Mr. WELKER. We have heard all this before in the Committee for the District of Columbia. I have understood that the Government gave lots to the canal company to help make it, and after awhile took those lots back and gave the canal company $150,000 to aid them to construct the work. It was a kind of thimble-rigging, not very advantageous to the interests of the Government. The company failed to build the canal, and thereupon the Government took back the lots and gave them $150,000 to enable the company to build the canal. The capital stock of the company originally was but $100,000, and the Government made that large contribution to keep it going.

There is no end to the propositions to abate the nuisance which this canal creates. And now one word in regard to what the gentleman has said of the report of the engineers. I know that the mayor of Washington has dug out the canal since this bill has been pending so as to let into it the waters of the river. It may be, and I hope it is, true that the nuisance is abated for this year; but whoever may be here in the next session of Congress will be called upon to make an appropriation for the next year, or, at least, be asked to levy a tax on the property owners of Washington to pay the expense of this year. Remember that the $75,000 expended this summer was only for "sanitary purposes," and merely temporary. Here is an opportunity to get rid of this evil. I feel as much interested in the city of Washington, and I trust every member of the committee feels the same interest as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] does. I look forward to the time when this will be a great city; and believing that it will be a great city I want to get rid of this great nuisance.

Mr. COBB. I demand the previous question on the bill.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I would ask, for information, whether a motion to recommit the bill is now in order.

The SPEAKER. Such a motion would be in order if the previous question were not demanded.

Mr. F. THOMAS. Well, if the previous question be not sustained I shall submit that motion.

Mr. DAVIS. Before the question is taken on seconding the previous question, is it in order to move to postpone the further consideration of this subject?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending the demand for the previous question.

The question was put on seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 42, noes 41; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. COBB and PHELPS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 57.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I will preface the motion I am about to make by declaring that the Committee for the District of Columbia have this whole subject before them in another shape, and that it is only necessary for them to wait until a board of scientific officers shall have made a thorough examination of this canal, and shall have reported to Congress the best mode for its improvement, so as to give the Government of the United States no further trouble on the subject. As the subject is therefore now before the committee I see no necessity for recommitting this particular bill to that committee. I therefore move that this bill be indefinitely postponed, and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. COBB. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to indefinitely postpone.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 62, nays 62, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Baker, Bergen, Bidwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Colbroth, Cook, Davis, Dawson, DeLoce, Denison, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, McKee, Moulton, Niblack, Orth, Phelps, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—62.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bennett, Bingham, Boutwell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Darling, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Holmes, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Kelley, Kelso, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Morris, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Trowbridge, Upson, William B. Washburn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Benjamin, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Cullom, Culver, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Eldridge, Goodyear, Harris, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, Marston, Melodee, Moorhead, Morrill, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Plants, Radford, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Smith, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Bart Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, and Wentworth—39.

The SPEAKER. The vote by yeas and nays being a tie, the Chair votes in the negative.

So the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely was not agreed to.

Mr. HART. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 60, noes 34.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. COBB called for tellers on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Before the question on ordering tellers was taken,

Mr. COBB said: I would inquire of the Chair, what will be the effect if the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table should be agreed to?

The SPEAKER. The effect will be to leave the bill with the committee to which it has been recommitted.

Mr. COBB. Suppose the motion to reconsider is not laid on the table; what will be the effect of that?

The SPEAKER. The question would then recur upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted. And if that vote should be reconsidered the bill would then be before the House.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers, and they were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was accordingly laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the select committee on civil service of the United States.

Mr. JENCKES. As chairman of that committee, I have a matter to bring before the House for its consideration. But I do not wish to do so till to-morrow; and therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the call of committees is progressing very slowly; indeed; and if there is no morning hour occupied to-day, there will be one less committee reached before Congress shall adjourn.

Mr. JENCKES. The business I intend to bring before the House upon this call of committees will not take any great length of time, and I prefer to bring it forward to-morrow morning rather than at this late hour of to-day.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn, and on a division there were—ayes 48, noes 49.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, called for tellers on the motion to adjourn.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether we cannot, by unanimous consent, proceed with other business, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] retaining his right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to any arrangement of that sort.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Rhode Island to yield to me for a moment that I may present a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. JENCKES. I yield for that purpose.

APPOINTMENTS TO MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. SCHENCK. I present the following report from the committee of conference on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) relative to appointments to the Military Academy of the United States:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) relative to appointments to the Military Academy of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate with the following amendments thereto:

In line three of the Senate amendment, after the word "after," insert the words "those who enter."

In line eleven, after the word "prescribe," strike out all the remainder to the end of the Senate amendment and insert the following:

And in like manner the President of the United States shall be authorized hereafter to nominate fifty at large each year, instead of ten as now provided by law, who shall be examined under like regulations, and of whom the ten who may be reported as most meritorious and best qualified shall be appointed: Provided, however, That not more than two of these shall be appointed in any year from one State.

And that the Senate agree to the same.

HENRY WILSON,

H. B. ANTHONY,

T. A. HENDRICKS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK,

H. E. PAINE,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JENCKES. I move that the House adjourn.

On agreeing to the motion there were—ayes 36, noes 51; no quorum voting.

Mr. JENCKES. I withdraw the motion. I desire to say that I do not wish to occupy more than a few minutes with the report of this committee; and I prefer to present it in the morning rather than now. If there is any business which other gentlemen desire now to bring forward, I am willing to yield a great part of the time which the rule concedes to me.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to any arrangement of that sort. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not, perhaps, understand my proposition. The rules of the House allow me, when reporting a bill, a fixed period of time, of which I wish to occupy but a portion. I am willing to yield to any member for other business, reserving simply twenty minutes of the time which the rules allow me.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from Rhode Island yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. JENCKES. I will.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. On that motion I demand tellers. I know that there is not a quorum present, and I think that we ought to adjourn.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. WINDOM, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 24.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. DENISON: The petition of C. Sherwood, and 158 others, citizens of Luzerne and Wyoming counties, Pennsylvania, asking for a mail route from Old Forge, in Luzerne county, to Factoryville, in Wyoming county.

By Mr. ELIOT: The petition of Thomas M. James, George Hudland, Jr., and others, citizens of New Bedford, Massachusetts, praying for a law regulating inter-State insurance companies.

By Mr. ROUSSEAU: A communication from T. N. Hornsly on the subject of artillery and projectiles.

Also, a letter from the adjutant general of Kentucky, concerning the remuneration of officers who acted as brigadier generals upon colonels' pay; and the payment of bounties to soldiers who enlisted at the beginning of the war.

IN SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of Chautauqua county and a petition of citizens of Erie county, New York, praying for the repeal or modification of the act imposing a tax of ten per cent. on any bank that shall pay out on or after the 1st of July next the notes of any State bank or banks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS presented two petitions of citizens of Chenango county, New York, praying for the repeal or modification of the act imposing a tax of ten per cent. on any bank that shall pay out on or after the 1st of July next the notes of any State bank or banks; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of the General Assembly of Florida, in reference to the direct tax levied upon the State, and praying that they may be granted the same privileges in relation thereto as have been granted to the States which remained loyal to the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COWAN, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Thaddeus Hyatt, praying for an extension of his patent for improvements in vault covers, reported a bill (S. No. 367) to extend the time of letters-patent issued to Thaddeus Hyatt; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 587) to incorporate the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union of Washington, District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was recommended a bill (S. No. 289) to provide for the probate of and for the recording of wills of real estate situated in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 270) securing to non-resident litigants the benefit of the jurisdiction of the United States courts in the States lately in rebellion in certain cases, have directed me to report that in their judgment the bill ought not to pass. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 205) fixing the salaries of the district judges of the United States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the memorial of John R. Bartlett, submitting to Congress a work entitled "The Literature of the Rebellion," asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution for the purchase of blank copies of Hickey's edition of the Constitution, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. LANE of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Samuel Redfield, a soldier in the war of 1812, praying that the soldiers of that war may be included in the provisions of the bill for the equalization of bounties, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; which was agreed to.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print the Report of the Commissioner of Patents, for 1866, when presented, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage, and also to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the Report of the Commissioner of Patents for 1866, when prepared, be printed, and that four thousand extra copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the reduced number that has been printed heretofore. It was formerly ten thousand, but the report of the two preceding years having been reduced to four thousand, a corresponding reduction is made for this year. The report is not yet printed, but the object in passing the resolution is, that as the drawings are made in the Patent Office, they may be put at once into the hands of the engravers, so that when the report is presented the entire engraving may be done, and the work thus expedited nearly a year. There is no additional cost.

The resolution was adopted.

AUSTRIAN TROOPS FOR MEXICO.

On the motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by him yesterday:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information in the possession of the executive government in regard to the departure of troops from Austria for Mexico.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This resolution, I believe, at all events I hope, will bring information most satisfactory to the people and Government of the United States. In connection with it I will say that I have received assurances which I cannot doubt of the truth of an anonymous letter which appeared not long since in relation to what is transpiring in the republic of Mexico, very satisfactory in its nature, showing that in reality the French are preparing to leave the republic of Mexico with their troops.

The resolution was agreed to.

KANSAS AND NEOSHO VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to postpone all prior orders, and take up for consideration Senate bill No. 285, which was laid aside the other day at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. He is now satisfied that the bill ought to pass. I think it can be readily disposed of without consuming much time.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 235) granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho valley railroad and its extension to Red river, the pending question being upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands to the eleventh section of the bill, which was to strike out the words "may connect with the Kansas and Neosho valley railroad at any point on the line of said road," and insert other words; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That any railroad company chartered under any law of the United States, or of any State which may have been heretofore or shall hereafter be recognized and subsidized by any act of the Congress of the United States, may connect, unite, and consolidate with this railroad company, after the same shall be located to the valley of the Neosho river, upon just, fair, and equitable terms, to be agreed upon between the parties, and shall not be against the public interest or the interest of the United States; nor shall any road authorized to connect as aforesaid charge the road so connecting a greater tariff per mile for freight or passengers than is charged for the same per mile by its own road: And provided further, That should the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Fort Gibson Railroad Company, or the Union Pacific Railroad Company, southern branch, construct and complete its road to that point on the southern boundary of the State of Kansas where the line of said Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad shall cross the same, before the said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company shall have constructed and completed its said road to said point, then and in that event the company so first reaching in completion the said point on the southern boundary of the State of Kansas shall be authorized, upon obtaining the written approval of the President of the United States, to construct and operate its line of railroad from said point to a point at or near Preston, in the State of Texas, with grants of land according to the provisions of this bill, but upon the further special condition, nevertheless, that said railroad company shall have commenced in good faith the construction thereof before the said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company shall have completed its said railroad to said point: And provided further, That said other railroad company, so having commenced said work in good faith, shall continue to prosecute the same with sufficient energy to insure the completion of the same within a reasonable time, subject to the approval of the President of the United States: And provided further, That the right of way, when not otherwise granted in this bill, shall be obtained by said Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company or either of the other companies named in this act, in accordance with the provisions of section three of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

Mr. POMEROY. At the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] I desire to move a slight amendment to the amendment. In the thirty-ninth line after the word "bill"

I move to insert the words "and not provided for by law," and also to strike out that word "bill" and insert the word "act." The amendment that I propose is to the proviso referring to the right of way; and as amended the section will provide that they shall get the right of way under the provisions of the Pacific railroad act, when not otherwise provided for by law.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. At the suggestion of the same Senator, I desire to strike out in the third line of this eleventh section the words "any State" and to insert the words "State of Kansas," so as to make it definite and distinct. That will confine it simply to roads in our own State. It was thought, as it stood, it would leave it open to allow the roads from other States to run in there.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not expect to occupy the attention of the Senate further upon this bill, and perhaps would not except for the remarks of the Senator from Kansas the other day. He felt himself justified in saying that I had not stated correctly to the Senate the amount of lands that the State of Kansas has already enjoyed, and he read from the Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on page 168, in which there is a statement of the amount of lands that have been granted to the State directly.

Mr. POMEROY. An estimate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. An estimate of the amount of lands granted to the States directly; and this estimate shows that two million five hundred thousand acres have been granted to the State of Kansas. I stated that the other day; but the Senator did not inform the Senate that on page 167 it appears that there was granted to the State of Kansas in 1863 two million five hundred thousand acres, and also to corporations "for the Union Pacific railroad with a branch from Omaha, in Nebraska, from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, thirty-five million acres."

Mr. POMEROY. Omaha is in Nebraska, not Kansas.

Mr. HENDRICKS. These are branches; and also "to the Northern Pacific road to the eastern boundary of the State of California, forty-seven million acres." No portion of that, as I understand, is in the State of Kansas; but if the Senator wishes the Senate to understand—

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will allow me to correct him, not one foot of the line from Omaha is in Kansas.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator state to the Senate that there is no portion of the Pacific railroad in the State of Kansas, and that there is no portion of this grant of thirty-five million acres in Kansas?

Mr. POMEROY. I said distinctly, the other day, that of the road from Omaha, the main line, there was not one foot in Kansas. There are two branches, one called the extension of the Hannibal and St. Jo road, and the other the Pacific railroad, eastern division, which are in Kansas, and, as I estimated the other day, about three hundred miles of those two branches are in Kansas.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The grant to the Pacific railroad is estimated by the Commissioner at thirty-five million acres, as found on page 167. It runs the entire distance of the State almost—about three hundred miles, I think the Senator says.

Mr. POMEROY. Both branches.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Can any Senator say how much land has been granted in the State of Kansas for the construction of the Pacific railroad within that State? The Senator himself cannot state it, because the Commissioner of the General Land Office has not communicated the fact.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that the Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, have built one hundred miles of their road, over and in my State already, and they have not yet got one foot of land, because there was none for them; it was all taken by settlers.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator how much land there is in the State of Kansas in the other two hundred miles that that railroad company will get.

Mr. POMEROY. It will get just about five sections to the mile, one half of what it would be entitled to if the land were not taken by settlers.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And how much that will be nobody can tell. The Commissioner of the General Land Office estimates the entire amount of lands granted to the Pacific Railroad Company at thirty-five million acres.

Mr. POMEROY. That is through to California.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The State of Kansas, by direct grant to herself has received two million five hundred thousand acres. We cannot estimate what portion of the thirty-five million acres granted to the Pacific railroad will be within the limits of Kansas for the construction of that railroad within that State; but there is a portion of the thirty-five millions; so that the Senator is not justified in saying to the Senate that the State of Kansas has received less lands than the other States.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the Senator if the State has received one acre of that. Does the Commissioner report that we have actually received one acre? It is only his estimate that we shall do it after the road is built.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is a grant of land. The grant is complete. If the road be not built of course the lands will not be realized by the company undertaking to build it. The point the Senator made the other day, as I understand it, was that I charged against the State of Kansas what was granted to the Pacific Railroad Company, and that that was granted, not to the State, but to the company. What difference does it make to the land interest of the country? If Congress sees fit to grant land to a corporation in the State of Kansas, that is not to be charged to the State of Kansas as a portion of the public lands going to make important improvements in that State. Why, sir, that principle would exclude us from considering as against the State of Kansas the grant that it is now proposed to make, for that is not a grant to the State of Kansas for her own benefit, but this is a grant to a corporation in the State of Kansas.

The Senator told the Senate the other day that this was like the usual grants to States for railroad purposes. The Senator misunderstood the language which he used himself. This bill is a grant to the State of Kansas for the benefit of a particular company; and in that particular it is altogether different from the other grants that have been made. We make grants to States and give the entire grant to the control of the State, and say that that State may transfer the grant to whatever corporation she pleases. I ask the attention of the Senate to the language used in this bill, "for the purpose of aiding the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company"—a particular company that Congress knows nothing about. We cannot tell what the company is by even reading the laws of Kansas. It is not a company that is chartered by an act of Kansas. I understand that it is a company organized under some general law of the State of Kansas; and the existence of such a company, its obligations, its responsibilities, its means, can only be ascertained by going to the executive departments of the State.

Now, for the purpose of aiding that company in the construction of this road, the bill provides, "there is hereby granted to the State of Kansas for the use and benefit of said railroad company." Is that like the grants that have been heretofore made? Three years ago we granted land for the construction of a road from Leavenworth by Lawrence to the southern line of Kansas in the direction of Galveston bay. That grant was made direct to the State, and the State had the control of it. If she saw fit to give it to one company or another, it was at her pleasure. But this bill proposes to give it directly to the State, not for her use, not under her control, but for the use and benefit of a particular railroad company, the character and responsibility of which we know nothing about. It has been the policy of Congress to place the entire responsibility of these grants with the States—a good policy. The State can judge of the responsibility of the corporation that proposes to construct the road, whether it is well to trust that corporation with the control of the land or not; but this bill proposes, in extraordinary language, to make the State but a trustee, and a particular railroad company that Congress knows nothing about the beneficiary. Is Congress prepared to make such a grant as that?

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator must be aware that the State of Kansas has already granted to this very company one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres of land. That fact appeared before the committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator is not aware of anything about it. I do not question it, because the Senator from Kansas states the fact that the State of Kansas has divided the five hundred thousand acres granted for internal improvement purposes, under the act of 1841, among four railroad companies. So I understand. We had nothing before the committee on that subject except the statement of the Senator, which is satisfactory to me, that in the Legislature there were four railroad companies represented, and they divided it up, and this particular company that is to be benefited by this bill was one of the companies to whom it was divided, the Legislature giving one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres to one, one hundred and twenty-five thousand to another, and so on until the whole five hundred thousand acres were granted to four different companies.

But, Mr. President, the Legislature of Kansas has not asked Congress to make a grant of land to this company. I believe that in one case a Legislature in advance of a grant of land by Congress conferred the grant upon a particular company, and the General Land Office regarded that as a transfer of the grant by the Legislature; but the policy of Congress is to grant to the State, that the State may say what company shall enjoy the benefits of the grant, and throw the responsibility upon the State, Congress taking no responsibility of saying whether a particular company is solvent and responsible and enterprising or not. But here if we make this grant to the State, can the State control it? You may just as well make it direct to the company, because when you make a grant to A for the benefit of B, A is but a trustee for B; the real interest passes to B. So here the grant is to the State of Kansas, for the use and benefit of a railroad corporation that we know nothing about.

But, sir, with the entire surface of Kansas thus covered by grants of our lands, she now comes and asks us to make a grant to a railroad company where there is scarcely room upon the map of Kansas to locate the grant. For what purpose? The Senator says there will be but five thousand acres of land altogether under this grant. I do not know that. The Senator does not know that. His opinion is entitled to great respect, but we have not the statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to that effect; we have no map before us showing that fact. At one time, as a guidance to Congress in its legislation on the public lands, Congress kept a corps of clerks who were to keep up the maps showing the sales of the public lands, and thus Congress, by glancing at the map, could tell in an instant how much land would be granted by any particular proposition; but that system has been abandoned and we have no such map before us, and we have no information from the Commissioner of the General Land Office as to the amount of land that will be granted by this act; but the Senator says but five thousand acres. Is Congress then going to make a grant of lands in order to give a company five thousand acres of land, seven or ten thousand dollars' worth of land? For what purpose, I ask Senators? Do Senators say that that is a substantial aid to build an important railroad? What purpose can it serve? I said the other day that I knew of but one purpose that it could serve. If this corporation is willing to go into the market and represent itself as being a land-grant corporation, taking this bill into the New York market, it can say, "Here Congress, for a distance from Kansas City to the southern boundary of the State of Kansas has made us a land-grant corporation; the State of Kansas cannot take it away from us, because we are the beneficiaries under the bill; we come before you and seek to sell our bonds." Thus this company may get a credit by the action of Congress which will enable it to impose upon the business community; and for no other purpose can I see a propriety—certainly no propriety in that view—in passing this bill. If the Senator be right that there are but five thousand acres falling within the limits of this grant, why will Senators vote for the bill? Here is a route to extend from Kansas City to the southern boundary of the State, a distance of above one hundred miles, I believe. Are Senators willing to vote for a bill which, upon its face, purports to grant alternate sections for that distance when Senators say in advance that there are but five thousand acres that can pass. Why will you vote for such a bill? Senators know that that will not build a road. Senators know that it will give no substantial support in the building of a road.

Mr. President, if the Senator be correctly informed, I will state to the Senate what is the real purpose of this bill. It is to go down into the Indian country to secure the right of way from the southern border of Kansas to the northern boundary line of Texas and make the connection which Congress three years ago agreed might be made by another road; and upon that subject I will call the attention of the Senate to the act of the 3d of March, 1863. A grant of alternate sections for ten miles on each side of the road was made on the 3d of March, 1863, "to the State of Kansas, for the purpose of aiding in the construction, first, of a railroad and telegraph from the city of Leavenworth, by the way of the town of Lawrence, and via the Ohio City crossing of the Osage river, to the southern line of the State, in the direction of Galveston bay, in Texas." I ask Senators whether there was any commitment by Congress when that grant was made. Certainly Senators did not expect that road to terminate in the wilderness, on the southern boundary of Kansas; certainly it was the understanding of Congress when that bill was passed, that we were to aid in the construction of a road which was to be a through line from the Missouri river to the Gulf of Mexico, because we said "by the way of Lawrence to the southern boundary of Kansas, in the direction of Galveston bay." It was known to Congress that Texas was building a road from Galveston bay in a northern direction, with which this road would connect when finished.

Mr. POMEROY. I will ask the Senator if they cannot build that road under this bill as it is reported, provided they get to the southern line as soon as other roads do.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; that is true; making a partnership of that which Congress said two years ago, or at least gave to be understood, should be the exclusive right of the company that would commence and build a road from Leavenworth by Lawrence to the southern line of the State.

Mr. POMEROY. They have no exclusive right.

Mr. HENDRICKS. They have no exclusive right, the Senator says. Is Congress going to make a grant this year, to encourage men to make investments of their money, to encourage counties to subscribe stock, to encourage men to make surveys, and then next year make a grant to a road lapping upon it, running in the same direction and swallowing it up? Congress gave that company ten years—and I ask the attention of Senators to this fact—within which to construct its road from Leavenworth, by Lawrence, to the southern boundary line of Kansas. Three years have elapsed. Two of those years were in the midst of the war, substantially, from March, 1863, to March, 1865. Senators did not expect a railroad to be built in the midst of the war. Then there has been but one year during which this company could go on and construct the road to which you made the grant in 1863.

Mr. President, the point that I desire to make is this: that when Congress makes a grant of land to a State to aid in the construction of a railroad, and the State transfers that grant to a particular company, Congress ought not to make a grant to another company which is to destroy the grant first made. Was it the purpose of Congress, when this grant was made, to encourage the construction of an important road from Leavenworth, by Lawrence, to Galveston bay, in Texas, and thus connect the waters of the Missouri with the waters of the Gulf of Mexico? Certainly, that was the purpose, because it is plainly expressed in the act; and what a great road it will be—one of the important roads of this country; an important feeder of the Pacific railroad, in which the Government is investing so much land and so much money. I ask if, for the benefit of a few corporators, we are going to make a grant to another company to come in competition during the time which we, in 1863, allowed for the construction of the main road.

If Senators will give me their attention for a moment, I will show just how these roads are located. Here is Leavenworth upon the Missouri river. The road to which we made a grant in 1863 is completed from that point to Lawrence—a distance of thirty-five miles. It is completed, as I understand, by the intervention of the Pacific Railroad Company. By an arrangement between the two companies, that road is built thus far, and a survey has been commenced from Lawrence in a southern direction upon the route described in the act of 1863. That road, then, is built from Leavenworth to Lawrence, and is to run in a southern direction. That road is just thirty-six miles west of the Missouri State line. Now the proposition is to start another road at Kansas City, on the Missouri river, a distance of thirty-six miles from Lawrence, to run in a southwestern direction until it shall intersect the road to which we made a grant three years ago. The effect of it will be that for a distance of one hundred miles these two roads are to run parallel to each other, and Congress is to help to build both, their greatest distance apart at any point being thirty-six miles, and their average distance apart not to exceed from fifteen to eighteen miles.

Mr. POMEROY. I know the Senator desires to be right about it. When they run a hundred miles, I am informed, they will be forty miles apart, the distance from Fort Scott to Humboldt. If they run one hundred miles, they will be ten miles further apart than when they began.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no point at which they can be forty miles apart; for I have here a map prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and there is no point at which they can be forty miles apart.

Mr. POMEROY. That map does not show the line of this road.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is furnished by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and it shows that these two roads cannot be forty miles apart; for the Commissioner of the General Land Office has furnished me a map with the road to which we made the grant three years ago marked down; and here it is from Leavenworth to Lawrence. Lawrence is just six tiers of townships from the Missouri line, and the road is marked upon this map in a southern direction, running upon the township line to the southern boundary of Kansas. The greatest distance between the road to which we made the grant three years ago and the Missouri State line is thirty-six miles, as shown by this map furnished by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I do not understand what the Senator means when he says there is a distance between the road to which we made the grant three years ago and Fort Scott of forty miles.

Mr. POMEROY. The road the Senator refers to is located at Humboldt, and that is forty miles from Fort Scott, where the other road is located. They run parallel to each other and are forty miles apart at the distance of a hundred miles from where they start.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Humboldt is further south. The road, as located, is east of Humboldt. The grant in 1863 does not describe Humboldt. The Commissioner has furnished me the location of the road. Here is a description of the route as made in the act of Congress of 1863:

"From Leavenworth, by the way of the town of Lawrence and via the Ohio City crossing of the Osage river, to the southern line of the State in the direction of Galveston bay, in Texas."

Humboldt is not a town on that line. Humboldt may be forty miles west of Fort Scott; I do not question that; but the map furnished by the Commissioner of the General Land Office shows that Humboldt is west of the direct line upon which this road must be located.

The construction of these grants by the General Land Office has been that when Congress gives the termini the road must be located upon the most direct line between the termini that is practicable. The Commissioner of the Land Office, taking that rule of construction, has located upon this map which he has furnished us, and which is represented with the surveys of the State, the location of the road to which we made the grant three years ago; and here it is: from Leavenworth in a southern direction to the southern line of the State. That is just thirty-six miles west of the Missouri State line. The proposition is to get in a new grant to a corporation that Congress knows nothing about except as represented by the Senator from Kansas. His representation is entitled to all confidence, I concede; but we have no documentary evidence of the character and responsibility of that company.

Mr. MORRILL. Has it been organized?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose it has been organized, from what the Senator from Kansas says. I know nothing about it except what he has said. I believe we had before the committee no evidences of the organization of the company to which this grant is to be made.

Mr. POMEROY. The statutes of the State were before the committee showing that the State had already given them one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator says that the statutes of the State will show that the State has recognized it as a corporation by granting to it some of her own lands. I have not the statutes here, but of course the Senator is informed on that subject. Now, they propose to start a railroad on the Missouri river at a point opposite to Kansas City, in Missouri, and to run down until it shall intersect the road to which we made a grant three years ago; and whichever road can get to the southern boundary of the State of Kansas first is to have the right to run through the Indian Territory. That is the proposition.

Mr. POMEROY. That is fair.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator says that is fair. I ask Senators if that be fair. You made a substantial grant of lands to the State of Kansas three years ago. The State of Kansas has transferred that grant to a railroad company. That company has commenced its enterprise by securing, through the aid of another company, thirty miles of its road, and by commencing its surveys from Lawrence in a southern direction. That company has secured the subscription of stock by counties along its line, and is going on, as I understand, to complete this great work with a view to the connection of the Missouri river and the Gulf of Mexico; and now we propose to run a competing road between that road and the State line of Missouri. Senators can look at the map and see just how these roads will lie with regard to each other.

We have an illustration of this kind of legislation in the State of Iowa. Any Senator taking up the map of the State of Iowa will see that that State is almost covered with railroad grants. Three roads were contemplated by one act of Congress, and the grants lapped upon one another. If any one or even two of the roads had been supported by substantial grants of lands, they would have been a success; the roads could have been built, and the stock would have been of some value in the market; but as it is, one of these roads—the Mississippi and Missouri road—has her stock in the market scarcely of any value after she had received a grant of land from the General Government. Why? Because at the same time we made a grant to parallel companies and roads so near to each other that the one grant lapped upon the other. Are Senators willing to indorse that policy in the State of Kansas? And after making a grant to a great road, to an important work in 1863, after that work has been commenced, after investments are made, after counties have made subscriptions to large amounts of stock to that company, is Congress willing to make a grant now, between that road and the State line of Missouri, so near to it as that the one grant must lap upon the other?

Have we so little interest in the public lands as that we will make such a grant as this? I think no man, as was said by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] can be more liberal in his views in regard to grants of land to aid in great works of improvement in the western country than I am; but I do not want to see the system broken down and demoralized until the eastern States, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] referred to the question the other day, can justly say that we are squandering the public lands. I do not choose to be charged with that. As a friend of the system which calls upon the General Government to aid in the construction of great works, I do not choose to have the system debased and broken down by a legislation such as this would be. I ask western Senators, whose States are interested in works of this sort, to stand by the integrity of the system. That system is based upon the idea that Congress ought to aid the western settlers in the development of the country by the construction of necessary works, national and important in their character, but not, in order to grasp the land, to make one grant lap upon another.

Mr. President, as I understand, there are rights in the Indian country not yet secured. I understand that the Cherokee tribe have made no treaty which authorizes Congress to even contemplate the running of a road through their territory. This bill does contemplate it. When the Senator from Kansas a little while ago said that the Senator from Wisconsin had agreed to the support of this bill I was rather astonished at the statement. I understand that there is one tribe of Indians secured by the most solemn treaty stipulations against any invasion of their territory by the white man for any purpose; and yet this bill proposes to grant the right of way, as soon as we can get the Indian consent to it, and thus committing the Government to an effort to secure the consent of the Indians, as was stated so well by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] the other day.

For the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate upon this bill, I will move to postpone its further consideration until the first Monday of December next. If there are any treaties to be made with these Indians in the mean time, we can know what they are; the Senate can consider the treaties, and then we can tell what is the condition of the Indian country. If this is a corporation organized in good faith and with means to construct the railroad let it go on with its work. These five thousand acres that lie within the limits of the State of Kansas, and all that the State of Kansas will get, as the Senator from Kansas says, will not do much to carry on the work if granted, nor will the refusal to grant it do much to retard the work, unless, indeed, it is to be used as a means of credit in the New York market. We can very well wait. There will be no loss resulting from it. These people could not go into the Indian Territory now. They could not construct their road into the Cherokee country if they were down there to-day, even if Congress said so. As a test, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday of December next.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to taking the vote on that motion now, because I suppose we are limited in time, as the morning hour has almost expired, and the Senator from Maine desires to go on with the bill that was before the Senate yesterday. I trust, however, that the Senate will not postpone this bill until the next session. It is merely another way of trying to defeat the bill. When a man cannot defeat a measure by argument, when he cannot defeat it by facts, when he cannot defeat it by saying anything against it, the second way is to defeat it by postponing it. I hope this bill will not be postponed. I am willing to let it go over for to-day and be taken up at some time when the Senate have leisure.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think we may as well have the yeas and nays upon my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Indiana alluded to my position upon this bill. I confess that I have not examined the question. The statement made by the Senator from Indiana now that Congress has already made a grant to a parallel road running through the same region of country, as he alleges within a few miles of where this new line goes, is all new information to me. I am not a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and I was not aware that there was any such grant. It raises in my mind a very different question. If this was the only grant running through Kansas in a southern direction to Galveston bay I should favor the grant if the bill was properly drawn, but if there be another parallel road so near as is stated by the Senator from Indiana, it raises a question in my own mind as to the propriety of this grant.

Mr. POMEROY. What I said was that the Senator from Wisconsin did not object to this bill on account of the road going through the Indian country, and that was all I said.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to that, the treaties pending, it may not be improper for me to say, have reference to the grant of the right of way through their country for railroad purposes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator, who is chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, if such a treaty be pending, whether this bill had not better be postponed until we see what is to be the fate of the treaty?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is a question for the Senate to decide, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the first Monday of December next, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Cragin, Davis, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Morrill, Ramsey, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Doolittle, Edmunds, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Morgan, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Sherman, Stewart, Wade, and Williams—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Creswell, Dixon, Fessenden, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Willey, Wright, and Yates—21.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) relative to appointments to the Military Academy of the United States.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed without amendment a bill (S. No. 328) for the relief of Mrs. Abigail Ryan.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill and joint resolution, with amendments to each, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 243) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some point on or near Traverse bay, in the State of Michigan, and for the completion of said road; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 51) respecting bounties to colored soldiers, and the pensions, bounties, and allowances to their heirs.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 559) to authorize the extension, construction, and use by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of a railroad from between Knoxville and the Monocacy Junction, into and within the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 615) legalizing marriages, and for other purposes, in the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 406) to provide for the settlement of accounts of certain public officers; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

BOUNTIES TO COLORED SOLDIERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senate, before calling up the unfinished business of yesterday, the Chair will lay before the Senate a joint resolution of the Senate returned from the House of Representatives with amendments.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) respecting bounties to colored soldiers, and the pensions, bounties, and allowances to their heirs. The first amendment was to strike out the proviso to the first section, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

But where nothing appears on the muster-roll or of record to show that a colored soldier was not a free man at the date aforesaid, under the provisions of the fourth section of the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, the presumption shall be that the person was free at the time of his enlistment.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line four, to strike out all after the word "widow" down to and including the word "enlistment," in line ten, and to insert in lieu thereof, "were joined in marriage by some ceremony deemed by them obligatory, followed by their living together as husband and wife up to the time of enlistment."

Mr. WILSON. I move a concurrence in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line fourteen, to strike out all after the word "marriage" to the end of the section, and to insert, "shall be held and taken to be the lawful children and heirs of such soldier."

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

AMBOY AND TRAVERSE BAY RAILROAD.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 243) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some point on or near Traverse bay, in the State of Michigan, and for the completion of said road.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to proceed with the business regularly before the Senate, the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. CHANDLER. I simply ask the Senate to concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives. It will not take three minutes, I think. There will be no opposition to it.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment of the House of Representatives, which was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert a substitute, but was interrupted by

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is an entire new bill, as a substitute for a bill which passed this body. The House has substituted another bill for the one we sent them. The Senators from Michigan tell us it is all right. I presume it is; certainly they think so; but we pass it, if we concur in that amendment, without its ever going to a committee, and without any of us knowing anything about it. I think such a bill as that ought to go to a committee; it is a new bill entirely; and I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he allow it to be referred. That course will not delay it. I have no objection to it; but as a proper principle upon which to do business, when a bill of this character passes this body and a new bill as a substitute for it is adopted by the House as an amendment, is it safe for the Senate to concur in it without anybody knowing anything about it or how it is going to act? I think it had better go to a committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that it be laid aside, to save this discussion, and that we proceed with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine calls for the regular order of business, and the bill before the Senate must be laid aside, it having been proceeded with only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senate will make an order to print the amendment of the House to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered, no objection being made.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 12th instant, the following acts:

An act (S. No. 140) to grant the right of way to the Humboldt Canal Company through the public lands of the United States;

An act (S. No. 173) to confirm the title of José Serafin Ramirez to certain lands in New Mexico;

An act (S. No. 189) to confirm the grant of certain lands to José Dominguez, in California;

An act (S. No. 261) for the relief of Mrs. Anna G. Gaston; and

An act (S. No. 321) for the relief of Maria Syphax.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. CONNESS. With the consent of the honorable Senator from Maine, before the appropriation bill is proceeded with, I desire to call up, with the view of making it the special order for a future day, Senate bill No. 275, which has been reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can entertain the motion by unanimous consent, House bill No. 213 being properly before the Senate.

No objection being made, the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 257) to regulate the occupation of mineral lands and to extend the right of preemption thereto.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move that the bill be postponed to Friday next, at one o'clock, and made the special order for that hour.

Mr. MORRILL. I have a word to say about that. I hope that will not be done. I have been trying to get a chance to pass some little bills here pertaining to the District of Columbia. We have had but half a day during the entire session, and I find that those having charge of business outside are so much more active than I can possibly be that I have not got a chance to bring up the District business. I had drawn up a resolution which I proposed to offer, asking the Senate to allow Friday next to be devoted to business of the District of Columbia. There are a great number of District bills that have been accumulating during almost the entire session, and they demand attention.

Mr. CONNESS. I made my motion with the understanding with the Senator at the head of the Finance Committee that I should not interfere with the bills which he has in charge, agreeing that this bill should go over in case he should want to occupy the time on the day named. Neither do I desire to antagonize the bill with the necessary legislation that the other honorable Senator from Maine has in charge. It will be conceded, however, that this is a very important subject; the Committee on Mines and Mining have considered it very thoroughly and fully; and my object is to get the consideration of the Senate for it at an early day, in view of the extent to which the session has already been consumed. If it will answer better to make this bill the special order for Monday at one o'clock, I will make that motion.

Mr. MORRILL, and others. There is no objection to that.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the bill be postponed until Monday at one o'clock, and made the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 213) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, the pending question being on the following amendment, reported by the Committee on Finance, to come in as lines eleven hundred and fifty-two and eleven hundred and fifty-three after the appropriation for the Metropolitan police:

For the construction of a police telegraph, $15,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After "telegraph" the amendment should be amended by inserting "in the city of Washington."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, the annual salary of the Treasurer of the United States shall be $6,500, the additional salary herein provided for for the year ending June 30, 1867, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, the salary of the Commissioner of Public Buildings shall be $2,500 per annum, and the increase of salary herein authorized may be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to appoint a private secretary, at an annual salary of $3,500; a short-hand writer, at an annual salary of $2,500; a clerk of pardons at an annual salary of $2,000; and one clerk of the fourth class; and the amount necessary to pay the salaries of the officers and clerks herein provided for for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and also such sum as may be necessary to pay the salaries of said officers and clerks from the date of their appointment to the end of the fiscal year 1866, are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. To that section I propose some amendments. First, in line three, after the word "dollars," to insert "an assistant secretary at a salary of $2,500."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line six I move to strike out the words "one clerk" and insert "three clerks;" so as to provide for three clerks of the fourth class.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The next amendment is in line six, after the word "class" to insert:

A steward of the President's household, who shall receive an annual salary of $2,000; and said steward shall have the custody of the plate, furniture, and other public property in the President's House, and shall give a bond to the United States in such sum as the Secretary of the Interior shall deem sufficient, and to be approved by him, for the faithful discharge of his trust.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move, in the third line, to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$4,000." I think that is but a reasonable compensation for the gentleman who shall be the private secretary of the President.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance considered the question of the salary of the secretary of the President, and they saw no reason why the secretary of the President should receive more than the Assistant Secretaries of the several Departments and the heads of bureaus. They thought it would make difficulty to give more, and that $3,500 was a sufficient sum. Heretofore the President has had only one secretary, and he has received but $2,000 or $2,500; and this not only gives him a secretary at $3,500, but an assistant secretary at $2,500, and a short hand-writer at the same rate, besides three clerks of the fourth class. The committee were of opinion that it would make a considerable difficulty, and that there was no good reason why the President's secretary should receive more than the Assistant Secretaries of the Departments.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought it but reasonable to make the amendment I have proposed. Every Senator knows the importance of relieving the President as much as possible from the burden that is thrown upon him in receiving persons that call, and certainly it is very desirable to have a man of fine qualifications for the place; a good business man; not an ordinary clerk, of course, but a man who can transact the business for the people when they call to see the President. I was induced to make the proposition in part by the fact that the House of Representatives has already fixed this sum of $4,000 as the proper compensation in House bill No. 211. The House in its bill on this subject, No. 211, fixed the salary of the President's private secretary at $4,000. I thought that as the House had expressed that desire, and it seemed to me to be right, the Senate had better adopt the same sum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The duties to be performed by the secretary of the President cannot be any more important certainly than the duties to be performed by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and his salary is $3,500; and it was on that ground that this sum was fixed. It is true that the salaries of the Assistant Secretary and the heads of bureaus in the Interior Department have since been fixed at $4,000 by a bill passed by the Senate; but that was our reasoning. The President at present has only an assistant secretary provided by law, but officers of the Departments are detailed there, and in that way he has the use of clerical force. We became satisfied that it was proper to give the President a corps of clerks, and thought that as it is now arranged we had given what was right. We have given everything, in fact, that he asked for and as he asked for it: a secretary in the first place, an assistant secretary, a short-hand writer, and three clerks of the fourth class.

Now, the simple question is whether the secretary of the President should receive any more than the Assistant Secretaries of the Departments generally. If we agree to this proposition we shall have to raise them all; and we thought it would not be reasonable to do so. Certainly, to perform the duties which the secretary would have to perform about the President, with all this assistance, I should suppose $3,500, as it procures Assistant Secretaries for the departments, would certainly procure all that was necessary. It is, however, for the Senate to decide. The Committee on Finance came to the conclusion that it would not be proper to go beyond $3,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine if he thinks the salary fixed for the short-hand reporter, $2,500, will be sufficient to secure such a reporter as it would be desirable to have. I understand that the short-hand writers in this city get much more than that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Only when employed for a few days; but this is a salary for the year round. He will get this salary all the year round, whether employed or not. It ought to be enough.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have understood that the short-hand writers in both branches of Congress get more than that; but I am not very well informed on the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very excellent short-hand writers are employed in the Treasury Department, with the salary of fourth-class clerks, $1,800.

The amendment of the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, there shall be an officer in the Treasury Department, to be known as the Assistant Solicitor of the Treasury, who shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and who shall receive an annual salary of $3,000. And the Attorney General of the United States is hereby authorized to employ in his office, in addition to the present force, a clerk to be known as the law clerk, at an annual salary of $2,500. And the amount required to pay the salaries of the officer and clerk herein provided for, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to inform the Senate that here is another Solicitor provided for one of the Departments. I made an effort in the Senate, some days ago, to prevent the multiplication of these attorneys in the various Departments, and we had the sense of the Senate at that time that they ought not to be multiplied. But it seems each of the Departments deem it necessary to have an attorney general attached to that Department. They have one Solicitor of the Treasury Department already. To that I suppose there is really no objection. They need a Solicitor in regard to the collection of claims in that Department; and if this went no further than that I should make no opposition to it. I am not disposed now to have another contest in the Senate about it, but I wish to call attention to it, and I certainly think it would be better for the public interests if the Committee on Finance, which has these bills in charge, would not insist upon multiplying the attorneys in the different Departments. I suppose they think there is a necessity for this assistant in the Treasury Department. I shall not move to strike it out, and I shall not contend about it any further than to say to the Senate that if any Senator thinks proper to move to strike it out I should certainly vote in favor of striking it out. The Treasury Department has one Solicitor, and here is a proposition for an Assistant Solicitor. I presume if this thing goes on, it will be followed by requests for Assistant Solicitors in the other Departments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe the Senator conceded that so far as the Treasury Department was concerned, it was absolutely necessary to have a Solicitor. If the collection of claims was all the business that was attended to in the Solicitor's office, he would be entirely right in saying that one Solicitor was enough. But the business has increased there enormously, and the committee came to the conclusion—I certainly did—that it was necessary to have an Assistant Solicitor. The Solicitor himself is obliged to be absent a great deal, attending to business out of the office, attending to suit &c., and the constant recurring business of the office is daily and almost hourly such as to require attention of one Solicitor. The committee examined the matter and became perfectly satisfied that at present, at least, and probably for some years to come, it would be necessary to have an Assistant Solicitor there. The business is enormous. If Senators will only reflect that at present there is not a Bureau in the Treasury Department that has not more to do than the whole Department had to do before the war, they will have some idea of the amount of business.

Mr. HOWARD. Has the Solicitor of the Treasury made any complaint that he is overwhelmed with business, so as to make this provision necessary?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; and it was on his application, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and on an examination of the matter by the committee that this section was reported. I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury recommending it.

Mr. HOWARD. Upon the request of the present Solicitor?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that the present Solicitor requested it, because he applied to me personally.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know how that may be; I was myself not aware that there was a great pressure of business in the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury. I was under the apprehension that there was no great necessity for the creation of an assistant officer of that description.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is the Senator familiar with the business of the office?

Mr. HOWARD. Somewhat so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All that I can say is that from the familiarity I have with it I am of a different opinion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the female clerks and counters employed in the several Departments and bureaus, whose appointments are made by the several heads of Departments under authority conferred by existing laws, and whose legal compensation now amounts to $720 each per annum shall, from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, receive in lieu of all other compensation an annual salary of $900 each per annum; and the amount necessary to pay the increased salaries herein provided for for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move the following as a substitute for that section:

That the female clerks and counters employed in the several Departments whose legal compensation amounts to $720 per annum, and whose appointments are made by the several heads of Departments under the provisions of law, and the female clerks employed by the Post Office Department, may, at the discretion and under the direction of said heads of Departments, be divided into three classes, each class to contain not more than one third of the whole number so appointed; and those of the first class shall be paid the annual sum of $720, those of the second class the annual sum of $840, and those of the third class the annual sum of $960 in lieu of all other compensation; the same to commence on the 1st day of July, 1866; and the amount necessary to pay the increase of salaries herein provided for for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator having charge of the bill whether that covers the ladies employed in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it does. They are employed under provisions of law, and that covers it. He has authority to employ them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted, and the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the addition of twenty per cent. to the compensation of the females, messengers, watchmen, and laborers employed in the several Departments, and under the Commissioner of Public Buildings and the Commissioner of Agriculture, and at the Capitol, by section three of an act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes, is hereby continued in force, and the amount necessary to pay the same for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to appoint in the several bureaus of his Department, in addition to their chief clerks, and in lieu of the clerical force now authorized, clerks as follows, namely: in the Bureau of Yards and Docks, one clerk of class four, two clerks of class three, two clerks of class two, and one clerk of class one; in the Bureau of Navigation, one clerk of class four, and one clerk of class two; in the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, one clerk of class four, two clerks of class three, two clerks of class two, and three clerks of class one; in the Bureau of Ordnance, one clerk of class four, two clerks of class three; and two clerks of class two; in the Bureau of Construction and Repair, one clerk of class four, two clerks of class three, two clerks of class two, and one clerk of class one; in the Bureau of Steam Navigation, one clerk of class three; in the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, one clerk of class four, three clerks of class three, six clerks of class two, and three clerks of class one; in the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, one clerk of class four and one clerk of class three. And the amount necessary to pay the increase of salaries herein provided for for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June 1867, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as a new section:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act approved April 29, 1864, increasing the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports, is hereby continued in force.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That in adjusting the accounts of Stewart Gwynn, under and by authority of "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866," for printing-presses, machinery, material, and labor furnished and supplied to the Treasury Department, and for expenditures under the authority of the Secretary, the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized to allow to said Gwynn such sum as may be equitably due, without deducting for expenditures made by said Department, or under authority thereof, upon said presses and machinery for the purpose of improving and repairing the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $39,276 50 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to purchase Indian annuity goods for the Indians, parties to the treaty of Fort Laramie, and for the Blackfoot nation, to replace those destroyed by fire on the steamer Frank Bates, at St. Louis, April 7, 1866.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to have some explanation of the necessity of this clause from the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is put in on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior. We were bound by treaty to furnish certain goods to these Indians; the Government had the goods to send to this nation in pursuance of the treaty; they were put on board the steamer Frank Bates at St. Louis and were burned.

Mr. HOWARD. While they were in our custody and before they were delivered?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. Let me inquire if this is not the same claim that was at a former session presented by the Senator from Wisconsin, and opposed by the Senator from Maine on the ground that it was a private claim and therefore should not be put on an appropriation bill, and overruled on that ground.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not understand it to be so. It is something that the Government of the United States is bound to do by treaty.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This is altogether a different transaction from that alluded to by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The goods were lost in our hands, we being bound by treaty to deliver them, and the only question is, whether we shall deliver them? The Department says it is very important that it should be done, and done immediately, and we have therefore put the provision in here.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the Committee on Finance are now disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. On page 2, I move, in line thirty-two to strike out "two" and insert "three;" and in line thirty-four to strike out "seventeen" and insert "sixteen;" so as to read, "three messengers acting as assistant doorkeepers, at $1,500 each; sixteen messengers at $1,200 each." My object in moving this amendment is to increase the salary of Mr. Phipps, who sits at the right hand of the President. He has been in the service of the Senate for the last five years, a faithful, intelligent officer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What does he receive now?

Mr. HARRIS. Twelve hundred dollars as a mere messenger, while the assistant doorkeepers receive $1,500. I desire to put him upon the footing of the assistant doorkeepers. The Senate will perceive by the language of the provision that $1,500 is given to "messengers acting as assistant doorkeepers." Mr. Phipps has been here these five years, "in season and out of season;" a man of all work, the servant of the Senators; and a more faithful and intelligent man we have not about the Senate. Really I have felt guilty for the last year or two that I have not made some effort to give him more adequate compensation. I make this motion on his behalf and for this purpose alone.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I feel inclined to object to this amendment; I recognize the merits of the officer; but I hope it will not be construed into a precedent, or that I shall not be held bound to accede to everything else that may be proposed of the same nature. The Senate will do as it pleases.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That amendment makes a change necessary in the amount of the gross appropriation for the compensation of officers, &c., in the service of the Senate. I move to raise the amount in lines forty-seven and forty-eight, on page 3, from $80,654 to $80,954.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "ten" and inserting "twenty" in line nine hundred and seventy-four, on page 40. It will be observed that the clause to which I propose this amendment provides an appropriation of $10,000 for compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerk, and contingent expenses of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington. My amendment raises the amount to $20,000. It will be observed that in the Territories of Arizona, Idaho, and Montana, the bill provides for the same purposes $20,000. In some of the other Territories the amount ranges from $10,000 to $18,000. I have in my hand a letter from the secretary of the Territory representing that this amount is wholly inadequate to the wants of the Territory. I will read a portion of it for the information of the Senate:

"I have the honor to call your attention to lines nine hundred and twenty-three, nine hundred and twenty-four, and nine hundred and twenty-five, page 39, of H. R. No. 213—or rather to the sum of $10,000 named therein."

The difference in the numbering of the lines I suppose is because of the reprint of the bill since it passed the other House with the amendments reported by our committee. He proceeds to say:

"In consequence of the reduction of the appropriation made for fiscal year ending 30th instant, of $5,000, there will then be due by the office of secretary of the Territory of Washington, for balance on printing laws, journals, &c., the sum of at least $7,000."

So that it will be seen that there is an indebtedness now on the part of the Territory of $7,000. There is no surplus fund on hand, which I believe has been suggested as a reason why this appropriation was reduced. Last year the usual appropriation was reduced from $20,000 to $15,000, and in consequence of that the Territory has become indebted to this officer in the amount of $7,000, as he states:

"Until last year the appropriation for a number of years—I think universally since 1854—has been $20,000. None better than yourself know the high prices on the Pacific side, when paid in Government currency. In fact, my estimates based upon actual expenditures, during the period such currency has been in circulation have been up to $22,000; and even now I see difficulty in trying to meet the necessary expenses, with most rigid economy, at a less figure. Of course the per diem and mileage fixed by law is not varied by the value of the currency. The other purchases or expenses are of necessity controlled by the value at the time of said purchase or payment by the value of the dollar currency at the point of purchase, if made in San Francisco or in any of the Pacific States or Territories. The following estimate, approximating to the average of accounts filed in the last three years, is really as low as it can justly be made:

Printing.

Incidental printing of the Legislative Assembly, say.....	$2,500
1,000 copies pamphlet laws, say.....	1,700
250 copies each (500 copies) Journal, say.....	1,700
	5,900
Legislative Assembly.*
Per diem 9 members of Council, sixty days, at $3.....	$1,620
30 members of House of Representatives, sixty days.....	5,400
2 chief clerks, sixty days, at $5.....	600
2 assistant clerks, sixty days, at $3.....	360
2 sergeants-at-arms, sixty days, at $3.....	360
2 doorkeepers, sixty days, at $3.....	360
1 chaplain and 1 messenger, sixty days.....	280
Mileage 39 members.....	2,600
Extra allowance to presiding officers.....	360
Postage members and distribution of laws, &c.....	120
Librarian, $300 per annum.....	300
	12,360
Stationery, bills for Assembly and office, say.....	1,000
Candles and lights.....	300
Fuel for legislative halls, library, and office.....	350
Messenger to secretary's office, at $50 per month.....	600
Clerical work, say three months, at $100.....	300
Office rent, at $25 per month.....	300
Incidental expenses, repairing furniture, public buildings, &c.....	300
	3,150
Total.....	$21,110

He also states that the estimate upon which the Treasury Department based its estimate was made by him while there was a difficulty in the Territory as to the payment of bills for printing, and they were not included in the estimate which he made of expenditures, and it was also an estimate made, not upon a full Legislative Assembly, but upon a Legislative Assembly that was only partly filled, and the whole amount of mileage and per diem was not charged. I am satisfied that this Territory needs this appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am authorized by the Committee on Finance to move this amendment, to come in on page 39, after line nine hundred and forty-seven:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized at his discretion to remove the whole or any portion of the machinery, apparatus, and fixtures of the branch mints of the United States at New Orleans, Charlotte, and Dahlonega, to such other branch mints as in his opinion may require the same; or, at his discretion, to discontinue the branch mints at New Orleans, Charlotte, Dahlonega, and to dispose of the property belonging thereto, if he shall deem it expedient, at public auction, to the highest bidder.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance for a moment to some items which I find on page 20. I find there an appropriation of $21,000 for additional clerks in the Pension Office, and another appropriation of $58,600 for additional clerks in the General Land Office. I understood, a few days since, when we passed a bill reorganizing the Interior Department, that we had so reorganized it, by increasing the pay of some clerks and dispensing with others, as to be able to fix the precise number needed, and dispense with the appropriations for additional clerks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That bill has not yet passed the House of Representatives; and it would not do to change these items now, because we do not know that that bill will be passed by the other House. The money cannot be twice paid, if appropriated.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But if this bill passes in its present shape, and that bill should pass the other House, in what condition would the thing be then?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If that bill should be passed by the other House after this goes down there, these items may be struck out by general consent, I suppose.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I merely wished to call attention to the matter.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose that if this bill passes the Senate and becomes a law before the bill alluded to by the Senator from Iowa shall pass the other House and become a law, that, so far as it is inconsistent with the provisions of this bill, will repeal or modify the sections of this bill with which it is inconsistent. If the bill reorganizing the Interior Department does not pass the other House, as a matter of course the appropriation bill is right and should stand as it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no danger arising from it, there is only a little discrepancy. The money cannot be paid twice, and if the parties take it under the new bill, of course they will not under this, and this will be a mere dead letter. There is no difficulty to be apprehended from it.

Mr. CRESWELL. I offer this amendment to come in after the third section on page 48:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, the salary of the deputy solicitor of the Court of Claims shall be $3,500 per annum; and the increase of salary herein authorized may be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask if that comes from any committee.

Mr. CRESWELL. I am not aware that there is any rule of the Senate requiring an amendment proposing an increase of salary to be submitted from a committee. I am certain that is not the rule of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the rule of the Senate as applicable to all appropriation bills.

Mr. CRESWELL. But the House have ruled otherwise in the construction of their rules.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We are to be governed by our own rules.

Mr. CRESWELL. I know; but I am not aware of any rule of the Senate on the subject. If there is, I should like to have it pointed out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the practice of the Senate, under the thirtieth rule, to receive no amendment to an appropriation bill which increases an appropriation unless it comes from a committee. The rule will be read.

The Secretary read the rule, as follows:

"No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation."

Mr. CRESWELL. My interpretation of that rule is, that it would not apply to a proposition, for an increase of salary, and the House of Representatives have deliberately decided so in regard to their rule, which is almost in equivalent terms. The rule of the House is:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government."

In the interpretation of that rule the House has decided that "the latter branch of the rule, not only permitted amendments increasing salaries, but was framed for that very purpose."

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is very different in language from our rule.

Mr. CRESWELL. I think it is almost in equivalent terms, though somewhat different in phraseology.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the rule has been generally construed to exclude such amendments. I feel in duty bound to make the point.

Mr. CRESWELL. This amendment does not change any appropriation in the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It makes an increase of appropriation.

Mr. CRESWELL. That is true; it is an increase of appropriation by increasing the salary of an officer whose office is already established by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that under the rule the amendment cannot be received; but if the Senator desires, the Chair will take the sense of the Senate on that question.

Mr. CRESWELL. I will take the sense of the Senate, meaning thereby not the slightest discourtesy to the Chair.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the matter ought to have been submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, who know all about the salaries of the different officers connected with the Judiciary. That is the proper committee to decide whether the salary of such an officer should be increased. I do not know but that it ought to be done in this case; but the ruling has always been one way in reference to such questions, to keep them off the appropriation bills. Perhaps the Senator may get the Committee on the Judiciary to report the amendment, on making the proper explanations to them.

Mr. CRESWELL. It is difficult for me to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order.

Mr. CRESWELL. I will take the sense of the Senate, with a view to settle the question, if there is any doubt about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate.

The decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move an amendment to strike out in lines ten hundred and fifty-nine and ten hundred and sixty "$1,300" and insert:

Which is hereby fixed at that amount, $2,500: Provided, That said reporter shall within the time now prescribed deliver to the Secretary of the Interior for distribution, according to existing laws, three hundred copies of such of the annual reports of that court as shall be hereafter published.

So as to make the clause read:

For salary of the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which is hereby fixed at that amount, $2,500: Provided, That said reporter shall, within the time now prescribed, deliver to the Secretary of the Interior for distribution, according to existing laws, three hundred copies of such of the annual reports of that court as shall be hereafter published.

*This estimate is based upon a full Assembly. But at no session for the past three has there been a full attendance, and as the counties remote fail to attend, my estimate for mileage may be high, and each absentee reduces this $180.

†For the past three years I have not been able to supply these articles for less than $1,400.

The amendment is in conformity to a recommendation from the Secretary of the Interior, which is accompanied by a letter from the reporter. The number of copies of the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court now furnished is not sufficient to supply the officers at present entitled to them under the law, and it is necessary to have a larger number.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do we not pay for those copies?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will observe the wording of this amendment, he will see that three hundred copies are to be furnished.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But do we not pay for the copies that are furnished?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Oh, no. The whole matter is explained in the communications which I hold in my hand, and perhaps it will be shorter to have them read than to trouble the Senate with a verbal explanation. I send the letters to the desk to be read.

The Secretary read the following letter from the Secretary of the Interior:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 6, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit the inclosed copy of a letter to me, from John W. Wallace, Esq., reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I respectfully submit that the facts and considerations stated by Mr. Wallace merit early attention, and that the changes suggested in the existing law should receive the sanction of Congress.

The sixth section of the act of March 2, 1861, (12 Statutes, p. 245,) as well as the act of July 9, 1842, (5 Statutes, p. 545,) cited by Mr. Wallace, provides for the distribution of the Decisions of the Supreme Court, and extends it to public officers not theretofore entitled to them. No increase in the number of copies beyond that named in the act of 1842 has been authorized, while the extension of our territorial and other Federal courts will render the number insufficient for the demand. The first volume of Wallace's Reports is now exhausted, although all persons who are entitled have not received it.

I inclose a draft of an amendment to the pending bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES HARLAN,
Secretary.

Hon. LYMAN TRUMBULL, Chairman Judiciary Committee, Senate of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The other letter is a letter of the reporter, showing the necessity for this provision. I do not know that it is necessary to read it after the letter of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to hear it. I am not yet satisfied.

The Secretary read the following letter:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 25, 1866.

SIR: By act of Congress passed in 1827 Congress gave to the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States $1,000 a year, and he was to give the Government eighty copies of his annual volume in return.

Eighty copies not being found enough for the needs of the Government, nor $1,000 for the reporter, an act was passed in 1842 (5 Statutes, 545) giving him $1,300, he giving the Government one hundred and fifty copies in return; and it being provided that he would not sell his book to the public at large for a price exceeding five dollars a volume.

By this act of a former day the reporter's obligation to the Government and recompense from it are still governed.

I have the reporter for several years a compensation of something over three thousand dollars a year. But it did so only in consequence of two facts:

1. That the reports were published in the cheapest style every way.

2. That, in the "long term," as it is called, the reporters would issue, when the occasion allowed, two volumes a year, instead of one; and that Congress, on these various occasions, gave them $2,600 instead of $1,300.

But with the increased cost of paper, printing, binding, and other items of production, that which was formerly a compensation is now no compensation at all, and may even end in considerable loss.

The cost of publishing one thousand copies of one of Mr. Howard's volumes, say the last one, the twenty-fourth, was thus, as shown by the publisher's books: Composition, stereotyping, and press-work... $978 07
Paper..... 346 13
Binding..... 400 00

Total cost of 1,000 volumes (Howard).....$1,724 20

The cost of publishing one thousand copies of 2

Wallace, the paper for which cost $196 58 less than the paper for volume one, was thus:

Composition, stereotyping, and press-work.....$2,087 89
Paper..... 769 60
Binding..... 730 00
Models, patented machines, and maps in land cases about Government tax, exact sum not recalled, but on volume one..... 75 77

Total cost 1,000 volumes (Wallace).....$3,863 06

Supposing the former reporter to have sold one thousand volumes, say at four dollars each, a large price, expenses being deducted, he got:

Gross.....$4,000 00
Deduct cost of production..... 1,724 20

Net profit (formerly).....$2,275 80

Supposing me to sell same number at the same full price, I get:

Gross.....$4,000 00
Deduct cost..... 3,863 06

Net profit (at present).....$136 94

Difference.....$2,138 86

I make no remark on the fact that the five months' stay in Washington, which formerly cost the reporters say, eighty dollars per month, $400, cost now, at $160 a month, what I pay for board accommodations, $800.

The sales of the United States Supreme Court Reports are not large, so many of the cases are of local interest only; so many on fact alone; the reports of the State courts have become so numerous and come so immediately home to the daily business of the bar that sales of much more than one thousand copies are not to be counted on. After selling one thousand copies of 1 Wallace, I invited the Johnsons, friends of mine, and large booksellers in Philadelphia, who had paid me liberally for other copyrights, to make me an offer for the copyright of the book just named. Their reply was, "After the first thousand copies sold sales are so small and so slow that the copyright is not worth making you an offer for;" and they would make none. My own volumes have sold, I believe, better than any since Wheaton's; but even the sales of my volume one, published two years ago nearly, scarce return cost. If paper will only go somewhat higher than it is, I need only to sell enough copies to be ruined, and Mr. Black abandoned the office at the end of a second term.

If the Government would only take three hundred copies, giving the reporter $2,500 for them, provided they are delivered in eight months after the end of the term, matters, I think, would stand on a more just basis; the necessities of the Government for the decisions of the Supreme Court have quite outgrown, I should think, the old act of 1842. Circuit, district, and territorial judges to whom this act gave copies in virtue of their offices have multiplied and are increasing, and the same is true of the Departments generally, I should think.

I submit the whole matter to you, and am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant.

JOHN WILLIAM WALLACE,
Reporter, &c.

Hon. JAMES HARLAN, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The whole purport of it is this: the reporter now has a salary of $1,300 and gives us one hundred and fifty copies; this proposition is that he shall have $2,500 and furnish us with three hundred copies. The Secretary of the Interior says more copies are necessary to furnish the persons entitled to them. The matter was considered in Committee on the Judiciary and the letter of Mr. Wallace was examined. We all know that the expense of getting up these books is twice what it was. The three hundred volumes which he is to furnish will cost the Government a little over eight dollars a volume. That would be an extravagant price for them, more than the books are worth if we were to purchase them in the market; but we pay that much additional in order to give the reporter a salary. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do we need three hundred copies?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is what the Secretary of the Interior says; he has recommended it. I have made no calculation myself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, I shall not object to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is another amendment that I desire to move, and I think the best place to insert it will be on page 25 at the end of line five hundred and eighty-eight:

For replacing to the credit of the judiciary fund the amount withdrawn therefrom and expended upon the custom-house at New Orleans, $4,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be better to put it in another place.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why not just increase the judiciary fund $4,000?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is better to specify. I suggest that after the word "repealed" in line five hundred and eighty-seven the amendment be inserted in this form: "and to place to the credit of the judiciary fund the amount of $4,000 withdrawn therefrom and expended upon the custom-house at New Orleans," and then to make the total amount of appropriation for the judiciary fund $304,000 instead of $300,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will put the amendment in that form.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In connection with the same subject I desire to offer another amendment which will come in independently, I think, at the end of line five hundred and fifty-eight as well as anywhere:

For paying to Messrs. Gallier & Estabrook, of New Orleans, in full the balance due them for work done on and materials furnished for that part of the custom-house building reserved for the use of the Federal courts, $4,268 65.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is not that a private claim?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know but that it would come within the category of a private claim; but the fact is that this work was done on the custom-house at New Orleans by an arrangement between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior. The term for which the buildings used as court-rooms in the city of New Orleans were leased being about to expire, the proprietors raised the rent—doubled it. It was reported here that there were rooms in the custom-house which could be fitted up that would accommodate the courts, and it would be a saving to the Government to take them for that purpose. A correspondence took place between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior. It was proposed to have those rooms fitted up, and it was done under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury with the understanding that the Secretary of the Interior should advance the sum of $4,000, which we have just provided for to accomplish the work. It was estimated that the work would cost $5,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury, I believe, agreed to pay $1,000, and the Secretary of the Interior $4,000; but instead of costing $5,000 it greatly exceeded the estimate, as is often the case, and cost the additional amount named in this amendment. The vouchers and papers are here showing it. The Secretary of the Interior sent us a communication asking to have the $4,000 refunded to the judiciary fund and this balance paid.

If the Senator from Maine thinks the amendment cannot be received here we shall be involved in the necessity of getting at it in some other shape. It is a claim that will have to be paid. The work has been done, and done in the way I have stated. I do not know whether the case can be distinguished from other private claims so as to let it go on this bill, but if it can be it had better go here, because it belongs properly to this subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If there was any law authorizing this work to be done I suppose the provision might properly come in here; and if it was an outside arrangement of the two Secretaries to have it done without authority, it being a matter that they are indebted for, I do not know but that the Senator might get the amendment on this bill if he would put it in a different shape. I believe, however, it does not meet the approbation of my friend from Illinois in ordinary cases for the Secretaries to undertake to do anything without authority of law. I suppose, probably, this was necessary and wise action under the circumstances. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will word it differently, so as to make it a simple provision to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay for expenses incurred in providing a court-room in New Orleans, there will be no objection if he justifies the action that was taken.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose, indeed I know, that the law authorized and required the Secretary of the Interior to provide court-rooms for the courts of the United States. That was his duty. It was not his duty to provide them in the custom-house. He had no control over that, I suppose, but the custom-house was there, and he had to get rooms somewhere. The lease of the old court-rooms was about expiring. The papers show that fact. He had authority to procure rooms, and I suppose, perhaps, he might rent rooms from the Secretary of the Treasury if that officer had them to rent. He had authority to fit up the rooms. That is done everywhere. That is part of the expenses in our western States, where we have no Federal court-houses, and in most of the western States we have none. The rooms are rented and fitted up, and paid for through the Interior Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will modify the amendment as I have suggested, there will be no objection to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will put it in this form:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the balance due for work done on and materials furnished for that part of the custom-house building reserved for the use of the Federal courts at New Orleans, $4,268 65.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. In behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I offer an amendment, to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That there be paid to the several clerks of the Department of State twenty per cent. on the compensation now allowed to each, to commence on the 30th of June, 1865, and to continue until repealed by Congress; and a sum sufficient for this purpose is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I must protest against that. In the first place, it places the clerks in the Department of State on an entirely different footing from the clerks in the other Departments. If we raise their salaries twenty per cent. we shall be obliged to raise the salaries of all the other clerks. I have an additional reason, and that is that the Secretary of State declines utterly to recommend any increase of the salaries of his clerks. He will not take any responsibility about it.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will excuse me for a moment, I received a letter from the Secretary of State recommending this proposition yesterday, but unfortunately I left it at my room.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then my first objection holds good. It will not do unless the Senate propose to raise the salaries of the clerks in all the other Departments twenty per cent., to begin with the State Department in this way. I suggest to the Senator that it should be introduced as a separate bill, or he may put it upon some bill to come in hereafter. If the Secretary of State wants the salaries of his clerks increased, and the Committee on Foreign Relations think they ought to be increased, it should be submitted as a separate bill specifying what number of clerks is needed, and what their salaries should be, and then it could be well understood. But if the Senate adopt this amendment raising the salaries of these clerks twenty per cent. I do not see how we can avoid doing the same thing for all the other Departments precisely in the same way, thus making a large increase of expenditure, which, in a large number of cases, ought not to be made. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be withdrawn, because its effect would be very injurious. I must protest, at any rate, against its being placed on this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. This proposition, the Senate will recollect, was submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations as an amendment to the consular and diplomatic bill, and was then discussed. It was objected by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that it more properly belonged to this bill; and it was at last withdrawn by our chairman. He is absent now, and I have inherited this proposition from him. It may be that it would be better to introduce it as a separate and distinct proposition; but I felt bound, under the circumstances, to present it to the Senate, and I do not feel at liberty to withdraw it. The Senate can take its own course about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senate will not adopt it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Library to move an amendment. It is on page 4, lines seventy-eight and seventy-nine, to strike out the word "sixteen" and insert "twenty," and after the word "thousand" to insert "five hundred;" so that the clause will read:

For expenses of heating and ventilating apparatus, $20,500.

The Library Committee have directed that the additions to the Library as well as the old Library shall be heated by steam taken from the wings of the Capitol, which will put in use all of the boilers in each wing—four boilers where now only two are used; and it will create a necessity for additional fuel and additional labor there. The additional expense is estimated at $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. The same committee agreed to recommend another amendment, but perhaps it is provided for in the amendments on page 8. It was to provide additional compensation to three laborers. I see there are amendments reported by the Finance Committee to the clause, and I do not know whether they would cover them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are provided for. It now reads:

For compensation of Librarian, five assistant librarians, messenger, and laborers, $12,600.

Mr. HOWE. The amendment of the committee was for additional compensation to three laborers from the 1st of January last. That clause would not cover that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That had better go into the deficiency bill.

Mr. HOWE. The deficiency bill has passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was the old deficiency bill for last year; but there is another one coming.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the bill, on page 32, by inserting after line seven hundred and sixty-two the following:

To defray the expense of introducing water into the Naval Academy grounds and buildings at Annapolis, Maryland, $9,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does that come from a committee?

Mr. GRIMES. It comes from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy and by the Superintendent of the Naval School. I will state that they are now engaged in introducing water into the city of Annapolis, and this is merely to extend the pipes so as to furnish the proper amount of fresh water for the Academy.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought we provided for that in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir. I read to the Senator the papers I had on the subject; I received them while the naval bill was under consideration; and he told me to put it on some other appropriation bill; I think on this one.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It might go on here with propriety, I suppose; but I should like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know that I can further explain it than I have already done. The citizens of Annapolis are engaged in the building of water-works, and have run their pipes down to the street opposite the public property occupied by the Naval Academy. It is simply proposed to extend those pipes into the grounds so as to furnish water for the uses of the Academy—a very essential thing. I have a letter here, dated the 4th of May, from the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to me, saying:

I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a communication dated the 28th ultimo, received from Rear Admiral D. D. Porter, the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, in which he recommends the introduction of water into the Academy from the pipes which are to be laid in Annapolis. He estimates the cost of this improvement at $7,660, and as it is an important and very desirable one, I have to ask the necessary appropriation for its accomplishment. An appropriation in round numbers of $8,000 would be advisable.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GIDEON WELLES,

Secretary of the Navy.

The appropriation which I have asked for in this amendment is $9,000. The reason why it exceeds the sum of $8,000 is, that the chief of the Bureau of Navigation, Captain Jenkins, to whose bureau is attached the Naval Academy, has had a reëxamination, as he is exceedingly punctilious on the subject of not exceeding an appropriation when it is made—more so than any public officer that I know of—and he furnished me a statement, which I unfortunately left at home, showing that the amount would a little exceed $8,000. I think that the amount I have specified in the amendment exceeds the appropriation he asks for three or four hundred dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a matter for the Senate to settle.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it is very necessary that they should have water at the Naval Academy; but I think we are endowing this institution pretty liberally this session. I should like to know how much money has been appropriated for the Naval Academy at this session. Water is one of the things they need, and I am not going to object to this particular appropriation; but I am inclined to think that some appropriations that we have been making for various purposes there have been exceedingly liberal.

Mr. GRIMES. What one?

Mr. TRUMBULL. There were several for statuary and things of that character that I think have been pretty liberal appropriations. In reference to this amendment, I will say that it seems to me we ought not to exceed what is asked for. I believe this is about the only institution in the country where an appropriation is permitted to pass where more than the Secretary recommends is put into it.

Mr. GRIMES. I have the naval appropriation bill here, and I would be indebted to the Senator from Illinois if he would point out to me the appropriation that has been made for statuary. I suppose that the Senator alludes to an appropriation of $7,000 that was made for enlarging the chapel. A recommendation was made by the Secretary of the Navy, based upon a report of the chaplain at that post and the Superintendent of the Academy, asking for $25,000 to build a new chapel. Upon my suggestion, that was changed to $7,500, so as to allow for the enlargement of the present chapel, and for placing in its walls mural tablets to commemorate the memory of persons belonging to the naval service who have fallen in the defense of the country. That is all the statuary that has been provided for. Since that appropriation was made I have been to the Naval School, in company with the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] who is absent, and who I am sorry is not here, because he desires to enlighten the Senate on this subject; and he was satisfied that I was in error when I refused to concur with the authorities there in asking for an appropriation to build a new chapel, being satisfied that the present one cannot be enlarged.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator will remember that I was unsuccessful in trying to get even $1,000 appropriated for a bust of the late Chief Justice, and now $7,000 is appropriated for the Naval Academy without any objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not going to take up anybody's quarrel on this subject. I was not present when the Senator made his proposition. I will say to the Senator from Illinois, as what he has said here may go upon the record and create an improper impression elsewhere, that I believe the whole amount that has been appropriated for the use of the Naval Academy during the present session is about one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. One hundred thousand dollars of that was for the erection of a new dormitory, and $50,000 of it was for an increase of the public grounds. If the Senator wants to reach this evil, if he concedes it to be an evil, of appropriating too much money to the Naval Academy, let him introduce a bill to abolish the Academy or to cut down the number of scholars. So long as we keep up the present establishment we have got to furnish accommodations.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The question will be taken on the amendments collectively, unless some Senator desires a separate vote.

MR. TRUMBULL. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment appropriating $160,000 to the Treasury Department, to be used in paying extra compensation to the clerks.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved. The question is on concurring in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of the amendment indicated by the Senator from Illinois.

The remainder of the amendments were concurred in.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment excepted by the Senator from Illinois, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was after line three hundred and forty-eight to strike out the following clause:

For compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to clerks in same Department, $160,000: Provided, That the temporary clerks herein provided for may be classified according to the character of their services: And provided further, That so much of the appropriation of $250,000 granted by the act of March 2, 1865, for compensation to temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to clerks in same Department, as remains unexpended shall be divided as follows, to wit: $100 shall be paid to the appointees in said Department whose pay amounts to less than $1,200 per annum, and the residue thereof shall be divided per capita to and among all the clerks in said Department of the first and second classes.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

For compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to officers and clerks in the same Department, $160,000: Provided, That the temporary clerks herein provided for may be classified according to the character of their services, and that the Secretary of the Treasury may award such additional compensation as may be in his judgment just and may be required by the public service. And so much of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, approved March 2, 1865, as forbids the Secretary of the Treasury "to award any such additional compensation after the 1st day of July 1866," is hereby repealed: Provided further, That out of the appropriation of $250,000 made by said act for compensation to temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, and for additional compensation to clerks in the same Department, there shall be paid to each person therein, appointed by the Secretary as a clerk or counter, who shall have served in such capacity for one year previous to the passage of this act, and whose pay amounts to less than $1,000 per annum, the sum of $100.

MR. TRUMBULL. On that question I desire to have the yeas and nays. The Senate was not full yesterday when the vote was taken upon it. The matter was very thoroughly discussed, and I suppose is understood by the Senate. I do not see the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson,] who moved in this matter, in his seat at present; but I presume he will be here. Whether he designs to discuss it or not I do not know. For my own part I do not, and I am willing that the Senate should vote upon it. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. EDMUNDS. I voted yesterday on the spur of the moment, and as appeared to me correctly, against the proposition of the committee. Inasmuch as, on reflection, I have changed my opinion, and intend to vote in support of the recommendation of the committee to-day, it is proper that I should state to the Senate, in a word, my reason for the change.

It is admitted that as a permanent principle it is unwise and wrong to confer this discretionary power or power of discretionary appropriation on the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer of the Government; but it is conferred, substantially, in the case of the Secretary of the Interior in the same bill, and without objection; and it is stated by the committee, and appears to be true, that this is only a temporary expedient to avoid the necessity of raising permanently the salaries of all the clerks in the Treasury Department. As an expedient, it may be justifiable, when, as a principle, it would not be; and therefore as a mere expedient, and not as committing myself to the principle which would be involved in it if it were permanent, I shall vote for it.

On this question of taste, as to the personal reasons which influence Senators to vote for or against this particular appropriation, it has not seemed to me precisely dignified for the Senate to take much cognizance of those outside affairs. When the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer of the Government locks up his strong box and goes home at night, and in a fit of nightmare happens to go out on his steps and deliver a speech to his neighbors or anybody else, I do not know that it is anything to us. It is a matter of his own. It is a privilege which American citizens, in good taste and in bad taste, depending a good deal upon their education and their instincts, always want to exercise; and if we devote ourselves in this body to taking up the cudgels every time that any portion of our fellow-citizens see fit, in the streets or in caucuses or in houses or in clubs, to assail our conduct, we shall have more business on our hands than we can properly and profitably attend to. I do not personally admire the taste or the propriety of such performances any more than anybody else; but I think the public administration of the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury has been such as to entitle us to believe somewhat in the mere financial rectitude of his conduct, whatever we may think of his taste or his politics.

It is upon these grounds that I shall support the amendment, setting aside the evening affairs entirely as matters that are nothing to us, and that we dignify into an importance that does not belong to them, and make the people of the country suppose that Congress and the Senate are in great danger of being overturned at the polls because some club, or some gentleman at a club or a meeting, makes a speech about us. I think we give it altogether too much importance. Coming back, then, to the simple question as one of business expediency, I shall go for it as an expedient, but not as a precedent.

MR. TRUMBULL. I am a little surprised at the ground upon which the Senator from Vermont proposes to change his vote, as an expedient. When are expedients to end? This proposition was introduced here for the first time, said the Senator from Ohio, during the war. The war is over; at least the conflict of arms is over; and now it is to be continued a year. It is to put into the hands of one of the Secretaries of the Government $160,000 in money to be expended, how? What for? Can the Senator from Vermont tell what the expedient is? Tell me what the expedient is. For what purpose? Why is $160,000 to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury more than in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior or the Postmaster General? What is the expedient? I should like to know. The Senator from Vermont did not tell us. He votes for it as an expedient. Now, what is the expedient? Expedient for what purpose? Why is it that the Secretary of one of the Departments must have $160,000 to be disbursed in his discretion, without rule, without guide, to create disaffection among the clerks of his Department, all of them claiming it, and those who do not receive any portion of this gratuity finding fault with the others? Is that the expedient? Is it in order to make these clerks dependents upon the head of the Department? Why not repeal all your laws, and put in the hands of the head of each of the Departments a million, or five, or ten millions of money to pay the clerks as much as he thinks proper? It amounts to that. You have fixed their salaries, but in addition to their salaries you put $160,000 in money in the hands of the head of the Department to disburse as gratuities among favorites.

This does not depend upon who is Secretary of the Treasury. I have made no remark in opposition to this measure reflecting at all upon the head of the Department. The Senator from Maine said, I think, that he was as much to blame as any one for introducing this proposition; it was introduced either when he was at the head of the Department or a friend of his, and he had continued it. I have no doubt my friend from Maine has a great partiality for the Treasury Department. He has presided there, and presided there well, and he has a sort of affection for it that leads him, inasmuch as he has disbursed the money, when he had it there, honestly and faithfully, and nobody ever complained of him, to trust anybody else in that place. I think it was a bad precedent when he was there; and if he was at the head of the Treasury now, with all the confidence I have in him, I should object, for his own sake as well as for the sake of these clerks, to his having such a fund put in his hands. It must be exceedingly embarrassing to distribute it. Therefore, irrespective of the speech that has been made by the Secretary of the Treasury, which everybody thinks was in very bad taste—that is a matter that I do not choose to comment upon in this connection one way or the other—indeed of that, the principle is bad. So says the Senator from Vermont. He says it is wrong; it is bad every way; but he votes for it as an expedient. Now, what is the expedient? When is your expedient to stop? Why is it necessary here and not necessary in the other Departments of this Government? Here is the War Department, with its hundred and perhaps thousand clerks, and the quartermaster's department. Why is it not just as necessary in the quartermaster's department, which is settling accounts amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, as in the Treasury Department? Why is it not just as necessary in the pay department as in the Treasury Department? I should like to be informed by the Senator from Vermont who votes for this as an expedient.

MR. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to my friend, the Senator from Illinois, for the little lecture he has given me, because it has been a part of my business in life to attend similar performances; but I think it is a little unkind in him, having led me away yesterday by the seductive arts of oratory, now that I have got restored to reason, to blame me for having been seduced only twenty-four hours ago, or rather for having gotten over it.

MR. TRUMBULL. You have been seduced a second time.

MR. EDMUNDS. The seduction did not last, unfortunately for the gentleman, or for myself. My friend from Illinois is very desirous to know what the expedient is that we are resorting to, and appeals to me rather than to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who stated yesterday what was the expedient, for an answer. I will give it as far as I am able. The expedient to which I refer, as distinguished from a permanent principle, is an immediate necessity for this extra work that this is to pay for, and which it is not expedient (using the term in another sense which my friend will understand) should be made permanent as the salaries of all these clerks for all time to come. It is precisely the same expedient, that temporary method of getting over an emergency, which, I assume, the Senator from Illinois voted for when he clothed Mr. Secretary Chase with the same power exactly.

Now, my friend says the war is over; we have a new Secretary; have done with expedients. The war is over, it is true; but the settlement of the accounts in the Treasury growing out of the war is not over; and if we are to judge from what my friend from Illinois has told us heretofore, in every other sense except the technical one the war is not over. We are plunged in the same confusion in a financial sense and in a business sense that we have been all the time. It requires extra effort on the part of the Treasury Department. The business of the country demands that these accounts shall be settled promptly, and by men whose skill and fidelity is beyond question; does it not? I appeal to the Senator from Illinois if the business of the country does not require that the matters in the Treasury Department should be conducted with promptness, with dispatch, with fidelity, just as much as it did last year; and whether the extra pressure which the war brought upon the Department is yet over? I think my friend from Illinois will be obliged to answer that it is not.

Now, what is it proposed to do? It is proposed to do for this one year more precisely what has been done for the year last past; and that is, to leave in the hands of the financial agent and treasurer of the Government money enough to stimulate merit and to reward extra labor and faithful and skillful and competent men for work which they do beyond what their salaries will reasonably support them in doing, for the time being. That is what I meant when I said it was an expedient; to carry us over for this present time, without a general and permanent increase of pay, the fix (to use a homely phrase) in which we are. The Senator from Illinois asks me why it is not necessary for the Interior Department. I find in this bill substantially the same provision to the amount of over eighty thousand dollars, in a different form of words to be sure, but substantially a grant of precisely the same sort of power to the Interior Department. Why does not the Senator from Illinois attack that? Is it because the Secretary of the Interior did not make a speech the same midnight that the Secretary of the Treasury did? Is that the reason? My friend disclaims it, inferentially at least; so do I.

Whatever may be the faults of the gentleman who occupies the office of Secretary of the Treasury, it has never been charged that any one of his faults was unfaithfulness inside the wall of his Department in the performance of his duty. If his religion does not happen to suit me, if his tastes do not happen to suit me, if his politics do not happen to suit me, I will not cripple his power to perform the duties that the law imposes upon him by refusing either to raise the salaries of his clerks, so that he can do it, or to give him the money to stimulate extra effort in the performance.

Mr. STEWART. I voted against this amendment yesterday for the reason that I was opposed to this mode of paying clerks. I believe that they and all other officers should be paid by a fixed salary. I do not like it still; but after some reflection, and being better informed upon the subject, it appears to me that it is necessary that additional compensation shall be made. Inasmuch as it appears impossible to do it in the regular way, this session at least, it seems almost a necessity, in order that the business of the Department may be well performed, that this amendment shall be carried. Therefore I shall change my vote, and vote for the amendment, not because I like this mode of paying officers, for I do not, but because if we fail to make this appropriation I am informed there is danger of embarrassing the Treasury Department, and that there is no probability of arranging a salary bill at this session. In order to avoid doing what might be a great evil, I shall vote for the amendment reported by the committee. They appear to have investigated the whole subject, and to have come to the conclusion that this is the only way to meet the emergency.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that there is much misapprehension in regard to this matter. It has been stated here over and over again that we have made these appropriations since the war commenced; that Secretary Chase and Secretary Fessenden exercised such powers. I may be mistaken in my recollection; I have not looked into the facts carefully; but if I recollect aright, Secretary Chase was never authorized to do anything that is proposed here, nor Secretary Fessenden either, nor any other Secretary; that this proposition was passed for the first time on the 2d of March, 1865, and was a measure supported by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was not here then; I was in the Treasury Department.

Mr. WILSON. You advocated it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I drafted it and sent it in, and recommended its adoption.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly; that is what I mean. It was passed three days before the Senator went out of office, and therefore he did not have time to put it in execution. We have placed money in the hands of the Secretaries to employ additional labor, and allowed them to classify the persons employed. I have no objection to that. I have no objection to voting any sum of money that is required to employ additional clerks in the Treasury Department, and letting the Secretary classify them as first, second, third, or fourth class clerks. I do not believe that any additional labor is necessary in that Department. I think the Department is exceedingly crowded at the present time with clerks; that there is an extra number of them there; and I think that is the opinion of everybody who knows anything about the subject.

But the question here is simply whether we are to continue and put in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury a sum of money for him to distribute, according to his own pleasure, among clerks whose salaries are now fixed by law. I said yesterday that I did not believe in the thing when it was passed, and I do not believe it now. It was passed at a time and under circumstances when, we all know, but little opposition was made to such measures. I doubted it then. I believe it has created a great deal of discontent in the office. It may be that there are some clerks in that Department who will not remain there; but I have serious doubt whether a single man will resign his place because he cannot get increased compensation. There is a change going on in the country. The fixed salaries are now worth more than they were a year ago. There are thousands and tens of thousands of very able men who have been thrown out of the military service who are now seeking employment. It is not so difficult to get able men as it was two years ago when we employed so many in the Army.

I am opposed upon principle to this system, and intend to vote to-day as I voted yesterday on the subject, and I voted yesterday, although political allusions were made, without any feeling on that subject. That was not the motive that prompted me. I have no disposition to renew that matter to-day. If we did, we should have a lecture upon taste, which has got to be very customary here in the Senate. This thing has sprung up very much lately. Instead of allowing Senators to express themselves as they choose and take the responsibility of their own acts, they are told how things ought to be done. I do not believe in it very much. I never accustom myself to that kind of lecturing. I say my say here in a very plain way, and if Senators choose to reply to it, very well. If they do not like it, very well. If they do not like it, I am sorry for it, because I do not wish to displease anybody. I simply say that this is a continuation of the sole original act of this kind that I think has ever been passed in the history of the Government. It originated on the 2d day of March, 1865, and we propose now to continue it. I doubted its expediency then. I believe it has worked discontent. If it was necessary at that time, I think the necessity has passed away, and I am opposed to renewing it now.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I feel a very strong repugnance toward this amendment, and I hope it will be non-concurred in. What is it? It appropriates—

For compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department and for additional compensation to officers and clerks in the same Department, $160,000: Provided, That the temporary clerks herein provided for may be classified according to the character of their services, and that the Secretary of the Treasury may award such additional compensation as may be in his judgment just and may be required by the public service.

It will be seen that there are two classes of clerks to be provided for out of this sum of $160,000. The first are the temporary clerks, so called; and the other the officers and clerks already properly and formally employed in that Department. There is no limit to the number of temporary clerks who may be thus employed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and there is no rule but the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury for the distribution of this fund, or any part of it, to those officers and clerks who are permanently such in the employment of the Department. It appears to me that this is a very loose and a very unsafe style of legislation. Is it the purpose of the honorable Senator from Maine to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint and employ in that Department any number of temporary clerks, the number depending only upon his discretion, his "judgment," in the language of the bill, or perhaps upon his caprice or whim, as it may practically turn out? Is that the purpose of the honorable Senator? That is certainly the meaning of the clause, so far as I can comprehend it; and under it the Secretary may at any time employ just as many temporary clerks as he may see fit, and the number may run up from twenty to one hundred, or five hundred, or even a thousand if he sees fit to employ so many. There is no limit fixed by the statute to the number.

A similar objection lies to the distribution of the fund, so far as it respects the permanent clerks in the employment of the Department. There is no rule by which the money is to be distributed among them. All is left to the caprice and the favoritism—if he sees fit to employ favoritism—of the Secretary of the Treasury; and it is beyond all doubt that in the distribution of the fund he will necessarily create great discontent among the clerks, and do injustice, at least to some of them. I prefer that the clause should settle the amount which is to be paid to each clerk with precision and exactness, leaving nothing to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

But, sir, it is useless to disguise it; this amendment will in its operation place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury $160,000 to be used by him, if he shall see fit so to use it, as an electioneering fund, as a fund to reward that class of clerks connected with his Department who have figured very recently so conspicuously as politicians; that class of clerks who have taken it upon themselves to lecture Congress on the subject of their duties here; who, acting under the impulse, as I must presume, of their chief, have seen fit to pass resolutions in their ward meetings, or in their associations, or clubs, denouncing the majority in the two Houses of Congress in reference to very grave and important measures pending before them. Sir, I will never consent to place the money of the United States in such hands, hands which may use it for such base purposes. I do not care who the chief of the Department is, or what may be his merits; in my judgment, it is an act of childishness and folly, and worse than childishness and folly, to place such a sum of money in the hands of a public functionary, who, according to his own givings out, is as bitterly hostile to the policy of this Congress as any man in the land. I will never consent to feed a foe, even though that foe may be a mere political foe. Let him remain in his place and do his duty, and not ask Congress to become the contributors of money to enable him to carry on electioneering campaigns. For these reasons I shall vote against this amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougal, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Van Winkle, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Cragin, Creswell, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Poland, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Henderson, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Nye, Sumner, Willey, Wright, and Yates—12.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That in cases in which moneys accruing to the United States from fines, penalties, and forfeitures, or other sources, have been erroneously received and covered into the Treasury before the payment of the proper informer's moiety, or other charges legally and justly chargeable against the same, so much money as may be necessary to pay said claims, admitted and certified in due course of settlement, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

This amendment explains itself. In the collection of forfeitures under the internal revenue law there have been a good many sums paid into the Treasury and covered, and there is no law appropriating them. This is intended to appropriate them in order that the informer's moiety and the charges properly payable out of those sums may be settled and adjusted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $20,000,000, to be paid by the proper officers of the Treasury to the loyal owners of slaves mustered into the military service of the United States under the act of March 3, 1864.

I will merely read the law on which I base this amendment. The twenty-fourth section of the act of March 3, 1864, is in these words:

"SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That all able-bodied male colored persons, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States, his master shall have a certificate thereof, and thereupon such slave shall be free; and the bounty of $100, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted man, shall be paid to the person or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States. The Secretary of War shall appoint a commissioner in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service, a just compensation, not exceeding $300 for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the fund derived from commutations, and every such colored volunteer, on being mustered into the service, shall be free."

Now, Mr. President, I am informed that the fund out of which these bounties were to be paid, that accumulated in the Treasury, amounted to from twelve to twenty million dollars. Under this act that fund ought to have been distributed among the owners of the slaves who were thus mustered into the military service. It was not, but has been used by the Government in its general expenditures. Here is a law of Congress, by which the Government of the United States has become indebted to the owners of these slaves, the "persons to whom service was due," in the language of the act. I therefore hope, as a matter of justice, for the payment of this simple and recognized debt by the United States, an appropriation will be made.

Mr. CRESWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRESWELL. I wish to ask the Senator by what authority he says the commutation fund has been expended? There is a report in the Senate, made in response to a resolution offered by myself, by the Secretary of War, in which he states that the amount of that fund which is on hand is some ten or twelve million dollars.

Mr. DAVIS. I said that it had gone into the Treasury, and had been used, I presumed, in the ordinary expenditures of the Government like any other fund that went into the Treasury.

Mr. CRESWELL. I think the Secretary of War makes the statement in the communication which he has sent to the Senate in response to the resolution I have spoken of, that that money is now in his hands, ready to be applied for that purpose when an order can be obtained from the President to that effect; and I know that recently applications have been made to the President for that purpose, to direct that that money shall be so applied. I desire to say that I believe this claim to be correct; I believe the faith of the Government is pledged for the payment of this money; and that that fund now in the hands of the War Department should be so appropriated; and if the gentleman will change his amendment so as to direct that the fund now in the hands of the War Department shall be appropriated to that purpose, I will vote with him for the proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. I will make that change.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I must raise a question of order on this amendment. I will inquire whether it comes from any committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the rule of the Senate to read thus: that any appropriations may be made in an appropriation bill in execution of a law of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the rule be read. The Secretary read the thirtieth rule, as follows:

"No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by the direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation."

Mr. DAVIS. The question of order, I do not think, is correctly made, because this amendment is obviously to carry out the provisions of an existing law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The provisions of the law are that it shall be paid out of a particular fund.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Kentucky has so modified his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without expressing any opinion upon the law, the Chair thinks the amendment is in order as modified.

Mr. WILSON. I have no idea that it is proper to put this amendment upon this bill, or that we need to appropriate for this purpose more than one third of the sum named, or, at any rate, the half of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no proper place for it here. It ought to go on the Army appropriation bill, if on any.

Mr. WILSON. In Kentucky about twenty-four thousand colored men were raised for the Army. Perhaps seventeen or eighteen thousand of them, at a fair estimate—call it twenty thousand—were slaves, and valuing them at $300 apiece, instead of twenty millions there would not be more than five or six millions required for that State. There will be a claim from Maryland for some; I do not know how many.

Mr. CRESWELL. I think myself that the sum of $20,000,000 is excessive.

Mr. WILSON. I think that seven or eight millions would cover all the cases everywhere; but I do not think it is proper to put it on this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Army appropriation bill has not passed yet, and that is the proper place for this amendment. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that if he wants to bring this question up, the proper place for it is on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I think that the amendment is proper on this bill. That is my impression. If the Senate intend to pay this claim or order it to be paid, it may just as well be done on this bill as on any other. If it is not the purpose of the Senate to pay it, of course they will vote it down. All I want is that the question shall be decided by a vote of the Senate. I think we may as well decide it now, as it is before the Senate, as on any other bill. I therefore hope that the Senate will adopt the amendment. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRESWELL. I ask for the reading of the amendment as modified.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the fund in the Treasury derived from the payment of commutations, under the twenty-fourth section of the act of March 3, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863,' to the loyal owners of slaves mustered into the military service under that act, the amount of their claims for such slaves: Provided, That the said amount does not exceed the sum of $20,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. Upon the suggestion of Senators, with the permission of the Senate, I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can withdraw his amendment, unless there be objection. The Chair hears none. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is suggested to me by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] that perhaps it would be as well to make an amendment in section seven, which has been adopted, to exclude a conclusion; and I therefore move to insert after the word "females" in the second line of that section, the words "not otherwise provided for;" so that it will read:

That the addition of twenty per cent. to the compensation of the females not otherwise provided for, messengers, &c.

It is a mere verbal amendment. There cannot be any objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, the title of the bill was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the memorial of James C. Pickett, formerly chargé d'affaires to Peru, representing that he sustained a loss by exchange on his salary while acting as chargé d'affaires, and praying that a readjustment of his accounts may be authorized; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CRAGIN presented a petition of residents of the county of Huerfano, in the Territory of Colorado, representing that the land in that county is claimed by certain parties under a grant from the Mexican Government, embracing upward of five million acres, and that in their opinion the land is the property of the United States, and praying Congress not to confirm any pretended grant and thus dispossess the settlers who have improved the country in good faith, believing they were locating on Government land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ADDITIONAL REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 334) to fix the number of judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to change certain judicial circuits, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of members of the bar of the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Wisconsin, praying that the district of Wisconsin be reannexed to the eighth circuit, and also a memorial of members of the Legislature of Wisconsin on the same subject, have instructed me to report them back and to ask to be discharged from their further consideration, as the bill I have just reported provides for the subject alluded to in these petitions.

Mr. NORTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 416) for the benefit of certain half-breeds and mixed-bloods of the Winnebago tribe of Indians, reported it with amendments.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, two thirds of the House voting therefor.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 365) granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 328) for the relief of Mrs. Abigail Ryan; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 51) respecting bounties to colored soldiers, and the pensions, bounties, and allowances to their heirs.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:
I communicate, and invite the attention of Congress to, a copy of joint resolutions of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, requesting a suspension of the collection of the internal revenue tax due from that State pursuant to the act of Congress of the 5th of August, 1861.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, June 11, 1866.

The message was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 365) granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 559) to authorize the extension, construction, and use by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of a railroad from between Knoxville and the Monocacy Junction into and within the District of Columbia, and the bill (H. R. No. 615) legalizing marriages, and for other purposes, in the District of Columbia, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 300; one of the members of the Committee on Finance desires to make some remarks upon it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to reduce the rate of interest on the national debt, and for funding the same.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I propose to say a few words upon this bill, and particularly upon the third section, to which I have prepared an amendment that I desire to offer.

In order to simplify the remarks I am about to submit, and to make the calculations they must necessarily contain more readily comprehended, I shall assume that the amount of debt to be provided for is $3,000,000,000, and now bears a uniform rate of interest at six per cent., so that the proposed reduction to five per cent. would effect an annual saving of $30,000,000, the sum named in the third section of the bill before us.

There cannot, I presume, be any difference of opinion among Senators as to the propriety of making this reduction, if it is in our power to effect it with due regard to other national interests; especially if it is true, as has been stated, that the application of this annual saving to the reduction of the debt, will discharge the whole in about thirty-six years. This proposition, however, is not true, under the provisions of the bill as it now stands, as it is evident that $30,000,000 paid annually for thirty-six years on the principal of the debt, would effect a reduction of only $1,080,000,000 at the end of the period.

It is true, nevertheless, that the annual payment of a sum equal to the interest for the first year, together with the proposed annual thirty millions, will extinguish both principal and interest in a little more than the time named. The interest must, in any event, be paid while the debt continues, and it results that if the proposed saving of interest can be effected, the debt will be extinguished by the payment for thirty-seven years of a sum only equal to what I have assumed to be its present annual interest. If this is so—and it can be demonstrated that it is—it becomes a most important and interesting inquiry whether the requisite amount of the proposed five per cent. bonds can be negotiated at par, as required by the bill and the conditions of the problem, as fast as the proceeds will be required to pay off the bonds now outstanding. On this point, although I have given the subject much consideration, my mind is not free from doubt. I propose, therefore, to consider the inducements presented by the bill to those disposed to invest in Government securities, and to inquire whether our ability to fulfill them authorizes us to proffer them.

I do not suppose that the proposed loan can be popularized, as was the case with some of the existing loans. It does not present to those of small means equal advantages in the way of profit. The high character of the security offered will hardly insure it a preference with them over other modes of investment in which they have confidence, in many cases from personal knowledge. It will not draw money from the savings banks conducted under their own eyes, usually allowing an interest of six per cent. The present bonds, with their interest coupons which would be paid on presentation by the nearest bank, and generally by the nearest merchant, had at first the charm of novelty, as well as of great convenience, in sections remote from the commercial centers. But the novelty has worn off, and the knowledge that it is somewhat perilous to hold these billets payable through a long series of years, and which if lost or stolen cannot be recovered if they come into the hands of an innocent holder who has paid value for them, has, in consequence, partly of the recent thefts of such securities, been pretty widely disseminated. And further, the occasion for the exercise of that patriotism which at a gloomy period in our national affairs hastened to place its little all at the disposal of the Government, has happily and I trust forever passed away.

Again, Mr. President, the rate of interest proposed by the bill is lower than that to which the mass of our people are accustomed. In some of the western States as high as ten per cent. per annum may be legally paid and received, if previously agreed upon, and efforts are constantly making in other States to repeal the usury laws, not, of course, in order to reduce, but to permit an increase of, the rate of interest. It is true that on Wall street the rate of interest is sometimes regulated by the character of the security; but this has very little effect in the younger States, where the capital afloat is disproportioned to the business enterprise everywhere manifested; where property is always increasing in value, and where, generally, the security is more readily found than the money. In short, Mr. President, it may be confidently asserted that almost everywhere throughout the country the use of money is absolutely worth considerably more than five per cent. per annum. I offer this fact, for such I believe it to be, to the Senator from Ohio as a satisfactory explanation of what he seemed inclined to think a reflection on our country, namely, that our Government cannot negotiate its loans as cheaply as those of Europe. It should rather be considered, in view of the fact that so large a proportion of the profits of every year become fixed instead of active capital in the next, an evidence of the enterprise of our people and the high degree of prosperity they have attained.

But, sir, I presume the friends of this measure hardly expect that any considerable portion of this loan will be taken by the classes to whom I have alluded. It is, therefore, necessary to inquire whether the loan proposed by the bill before us presents such inducements to capitalists and investors as will insure its being taken by them at par, the Secretary being forbidden to negotiate any of the bonds at less than their face.

The first observable feature in which this differs from former loans is, that it is not redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after five or ten years, but is absolutely irredeemable for thirty years, or for whatever period it is originally issued. It may be a new idea to our friends in neighborhoods remote from the stock exchanges that the value of a bond is enhanced by postponing its time of payment, if the security is satisfactory; but there are doubtless among them some holders of five-twenties and seven-thirties who will soon experience the inconvenience of exchanging securities with which they are satisfied and probably more than satisfied for others they may not deem equally advantageous, or at all events of seeking new investments of their funds. They will thus practically learn why those whose object is permanent and safe investment, prefer the longer loans, and will, perhaps, cease to be surprised when they see the sixes of '81 quoted at some seven per cent. above the five-twenties.

I can see no objection to the thirty years proposed as a maximum in the present case. A five per cent. bond is not likely to remain so far above par as to prevent its purchase at suitable opportunities with the funds provided for the redemption of the debt. Such opportunities will frequently be afforded by the inevitable fluctuations of the money market, and it by no means impugns the credit of the Government to say that there will be periods when these five per cent. bonds can be purchased even below par. It is not long since the seven-thirties, with their very high rate of interest, were below par in currency. Previous to the war, when the Government made loans, its ability to redeem them within a very short time appeared so certain that it was only wisdom to reserve the right to pay them off at an early day. But circumstances are now very different. The most sanguine cannot expect that our heavy debt can, in any possible contingency, be wholly extinguished within the time limited for the redemption of these bonds, and I think there will be no difficulty in purchasing in the market on fair terms, probably at par or under, an amount of the bonds equal to the comparatively small sum we can annually appropriate for their redemption. I do not wish the Senator from Ohio anticipate that the "good time coming" which he promises, when we can negotiate a four per cent. loan, will reach us within a generation. On the contrary, I entertain the opinion, although perhaps I have not sufficiently investigated the subject to warrant me in giving it expression, that the rate of interest or value of money is gradually but steadily rising on the other side of the water, and this notwithstanding the immensely increased production of gold.

Another and a very important inducement to invest in the proposed loan, is the exemption of the bonds, as declared by the bill, from all taxation—national, State, and municipal. I postpone what I have to say on the new feature exempting the income derived from these bonds, until I have considered the general subject. We were correctly told by the Senator in charge of the bill, on the unimpeachable authority of repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, that if the clause exempting from taxation by State authority bonds issued by the United States was omitted from the law, the States could not legally tax them. The most liberal construction that could be given to the national Constitution, with any show of reason, would not give to a State the right, by its legislation or otherwise, to control or impede in any way the legitimate operations of the General Government. The Senator from Ohio sufficiently showed how the constitutional right of that Government "to borrow money" might be rendered nugatory by State taxation of the securities issued for its loans. It does not authorize the complaint of injustice that Congress, in order to give an explicit assurance of an already existing exemption to the national creditors, has declared it in its laws.

But it is said that Congress has the power to give authority to the States to tax the national securities. This was intimated by the Senator from Maine, and assented to by the Senator from Ohio. If it is meant by this that Congress may authorize the States to tax its securities to an unlimited extent, I beg leave to dissent from the opinion; for to do this would be to invest the States with authority to control the exercise by Congress of a power specifically delegated, and I am inclined to think that to concede the authority to an extent, however limited, is open to the same objection. What cannot be done in gross cannot be done in parcels; and if there is impropriety in a large concession, it is only lessened, not avoided, by limiting it.

Leaving these considerations, Mr. President, to those more able to grapple with them, I propose to look at this exemption in a practical point of view. So far as the measure before us is concerned, no exemption from taxation of an additional amount of bonds is proposed. We are simply about to change the form of our debt, not to increase it. The securities we propose to redeem with the proceeds of the new loan are now free from taxation, and this is declared by the laws authorizing their issue. It is now, therefore, a contract with the holders of those securities, which we cannot with honor annul. If the new loan is not authorized, or cannot be effected, the same amount of capital or property remains exempt from taxation as would be if the proposed loan were carried into full effect.

There is, Mr. President, in some quarters a growing discontent, to use no stronger term, with this exemption of the national securities from taxation under State authority, the cause of which I do not fully comprehend. The existing loans were made when the necessities of the Government were great, and, to all appearance, the means of supplying them difficult to be procured. Congress was unquestionably justified in offering almost any inducement to secure these means. This exemption, among others, was offered, and proved very successful, and thus became a contract with the holders of the now outstanding securities. It is, of course, too late to make the objection, and if there are any who are disposed to advise a breach of the national faith they can have no adequate conception of the character or of the amount of evil such a course would inevitably inflict upon the country.

The discontent to which I have alluded is, I am informed, founded on the withdrawal of the large amount of capital constituting the national debt from State taxation, thus depriving the States while the debt continues of a legitimate and important source of revenue. This complaint, I understand, comes chiefly from the agricultural States. If so, I beg to state that the case is not quite so bad as they would have it appear. Congress has abstained since 1861 from laying any tax upon land. It is true that this is chiefly due to the fact that the constitutional mode of levying a land or direct tax has proved very unequal, and therefore unjust in its operation. It hardly mends the matter that slavery has been abolished, as that only adds two fifths of the late slaves, or some million and a half to the more than thirty millions among whom such a tax would be apportioned. The evil of the rule is, that the tax must be apportioned among the several States in proportion to their respective populations, and not the value of their lands. It will be readily perceived that such a tax must bear heavily upon the agricultural States of the West, where the value of land is much less than in the older States, and where the proportion of unused and therefore unproductive land is so much greater. Now, this best subject of taxation has since 1861 been left entirely to the States, and is certainly equal in tax-producing value to the capital invested in national securities. I venture to say, therefore, that so long as Congress keeps its tax-gatherers off the lands the complaint to which I have alluded is unjust, from whatever quarter it may come, for there is not an interest or class that would not be sensibly affected by such a tax. It may be well for those who are calling for equality of taxation, in view of the exemption of Government securities, to remember that the same cry may be raised by other classes in view of the exemption of lands from national taxation.

As to the proposed exemption of the interest of the new bonds from the income tax, it would certainly hold out an additional inducement to those disposed to invest in these securities; and as this would hardly fall within the reason of the decisions of the Supreme Court I have referred to, it is fair to presume that it is inserted in the bill because it furnishes such an inducement. With the income tax at five per cent. it would be to the holder of the bonds equal to an additional one fourth of one per cent. of interest on his investment. The Senator from Ohio has shown that it would very slightly affect the revenues of the United States, and the bill, if I understand it correctly, does not exempt it from State taxation. While, therefore, it must be admitted that as an inducement to invest in the bonds it is of great importance, it does not appear that other interests would be to any great extent injuriously affected by it. If it induces the purchase of the five per cent. bonds, it is giving, at the most, seven and a half millions in order to effect a saving of thirty millions.

There is another consideration to which investors in public securities attach great importance, and that is, that their punctual payment at maturity should be placed as far as possible beyond contingency. It may be said that the limitless resources and unimpeached credit of the United States furnish a sufficient assurance on this head. But is this true? They do, indeed, give an assurance of ultimate but not of punctual payment; and I apprehend that an overdue bond of even the United States, with no provision made for its redemption, although it would not depreciate in intrinsic value, certainly would in its market price. The bill before us promises—I should rather say pledges the faith of the United States—that the interest on the new issues shall be paid at maturity, and that under any and all circumstances the sum of $30,000,000 shall be annually applied to the redemption of the principal. But this provides for the extinction of considerably less than one third of the debt by the time it matures, and therefore does not constitute the inducement which investors are apt to require.

If it was the intention of the author of the bill to give assurance that the whole debt should be paid off in thirty-six years, the third section must be amended in an important particular.

I have already intimated that if a sum equal to the annual interest on the original amount of debt, together with the thirty millions pledged by the bill, be appropriated annually for the purpose, the whole debt, principal and interest, will be thereby extinguished in something less than thirty-seven years. In other words, the interest on the original debt, or one hundred and fifty millions, added to the thirty millions mentioned in the bill, gives an aggregate of one hundred and eighty millions, which sum applied annually to the payment of the accrued interest, and the residue, as far as it will go, to the redemption of the principal, will extinguish the whole debt in the time named. It will be observed that by this plan the sum paid year by year in reduction of the principal increases at an accelerating ratio. In about twenty years one third of the debt will have been redeemed, in about thirty years two thirds, and the whole in less than thirty-seven years.

There is no mistake in this. I have made the calculation, and figures cannot lie. It of course supposes that on the day the period of redemption begins the funding has been completed, and that no part of the annual appropriation to be applied to the payment of principal, lies idle for a moment. It must either be drawing interest or stopping its accretion, or the time will be lengthened. On the other hand, as the interest is payable semi-annually, if one half of the one hundred and eighty millions is applied semi-annually in the same way the time will be sensibly shortened. I may add that if the debt is extinguished in thirty-six and a half years by the annual appropriation I propose, the aggregate amount paid will be six thousand five hundred and seventy millions; but if we should continue to pay the interest as it accrues until the end of that period and then pay the principal, the whole amount required will be eight thousand four hundred and seventy-five millions. I mention this to illustrate the importance of providing at once for the gradual and not too protracted redemption of our national debt; the difference of the sums named as the results of the two plans being equal to nearly two thirds of the original debt. The latter plan is substantially that which Great Britain has pursued since she abandoned her sinking fund in 1819, for the sums she has since applied to the reduction of her debt bear so inconsiderable a proportion to its aggregate, as scarcely to constitute a departure from it.

I have gone into more detail, Mr. President, than was otherwise necessary, because the bill proposes to do away with the sinking fund contemplated by the act of 1862, and does not, as it now stands, make an equivalent for the rapid absorption of the debt. By its present provisions, which pledge but thirty millions annually, the whole will not be paid off in less than one hundred years, although the interest to be paid will annually decrease in amount. I however infer from the remarks of the Senator from Ohio that the author of the bill before us contemplated an operation similar to that I have indicated; and that, as I understand it, is precisely the operation of a sinking fund.

When such a fund is created by a municipal or other corporation its management is usually confided to commissioners or trustees, who stand, as it were, between the corporation and the holders of its obligations, with power to enforce by action or other legal means the fulfillment of the pledges constituting the conditions of the loan. The only difference that I can perceive between an ordinary sinking fund and what I infer is intended to be proposed by the bill under consideration is that in the one case it is usually managed by commissioners, and in the other becomes a part of the operations of the Treasury Department. To this I see no objection, even when considered in connection with the inquiries I have been making as to the inducements that can be offered to capitalists and investors to take the proposed loan.

It may be stated, however, that in the cases of corporations it sometimes becomes necessary to interpose commissioners in order that the fund may be invested in the bonds intended to be secured, as their fiduciary character enables them to enforce, if necessary, the payment of the accruing interest on those they hold. As these are usually secured by mortgage it is important to the creditors generally that those belonging to the fund should be kept alive; and this is effected by their being held by the commissioners, who are trustees for both debtor and creditor. It is evident that if the bonds are purchased by the corporation for its own account it is equivalent to a redemption or payment, and they consequently cease to have value and cannot be reissued. If the national bonds are purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury, acting only in the capacity of an officer or agent of the Government, they become extinct, or mere waste paper; they are in fact paid off, and the obligation they once imposed is discharged. There can, however, be no necessity in the case of the Government for keeping them alive. If the annual appropriation I have suggested is made part of the law authorizing the new loan, it becomes a condition of the contract with those who purchase the bonds, and the faith of the United States is pledged for its observance, and no security or guarantee can be more ample. It will of course be the imperative duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to carry into effect a law which, morally at least, is irrevocable until its purposes are accomplished.

The plan of payment I have endeavored to delineate recommends itself not alone as an inducement to the capitalist to invest in the proposed bonds, but also as a scheme by persistence in which the whole debt may be got rid of in a little more than a generation, if we are spared a foreign war or another domestic insurrection. It therefore becomes of paramount importance to ascertain whether the probable resources of the country, taking one year with another throughout the period named, will justify Congress in now pledging the national faith that $180,000,000, derived from customs, taxation, and other sources of revenue, and not from loans, shall be annually appropriated to the payment of the principal and interest of the debt, to be suspended only in case of war or insurrection. Are we prepared to give this pledge? We have had the assurance from a high and well-informed quarter, and I think it is nowhere disputed, that we can appropriate thirty millions annually to the reduction of the principal of the debt, paying besides the interest as it accrues. Certainly, then, if we can reduce the rate of interest as proposed in the bill, our ability to make the annual appropriation I have indicated cannot be doubted.

I have insisted on a pledge of the national faith not only as an assurance due to the public creditor, but as an act of justice to ourselves; and in this term I include not only the present and future tax-payers, but every industrial interest of the country. To permit the debt to increase in time of peace would be palpably suicidal. If the truth of this remark was not so obvious, I might cite to prove it the late declarations of the British Chancellor of the Exchequer. Their debt has not permanently increased of late years, but its reduction has been very slight compared with its amount, which is greater than ours, although the annual interest is less than ours would be at five per cent. When they abolished their sinking fund, instead of fixing an amount to be raised by imposts and taxation, and paid annually toward the reduction of their debt, they merely provided that their whole surplus revenue should be applied to that purpose, and the result is that but little has been effected. Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Mill, at least, have at length become alarmed at this state of things, and if they are able to correct it it will be by making a fixed annual appropriation toward its reduction, and treating this as paramount to all considerations except national defense.

The same remark is true of this country. Our resources are certainly greater than those of Great Britain, and more rapidly increasing, and I think are more at our command. Our annual expenditure for ordinary purposes is much less. We can safely fix a comparatively early period for the extinction of our debt, but I doubt if this can be said of Great Britain. If what I propose should be found burdensome at the beginning, it will doubtless be much less so at the end of the first decade, and may cease to be so to any inconvenient extent long before the thirty-seven years have passed. Until this condition is attained the business of the country will be more or less hampered by the existence of the debt; but I am persuaded that if by our legislation we can give the country and the world a sufficient assurance that the debt will certainly be extinguished at a day not too remote, much of the evil consequent upon its existence will have already ceased.

I have expressed doubts whether the proposed five per cent. loan can be disposed of at par; but as the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as several persons in private stations, more familiar with the stock and money markets than I can pretend to be, whose opinions, for which I have a high respect, have been communicated to me, think that it can be readily sold if it combines the inducements I have endeavored to discuss, I am willing that the experiment shall be made. I am willing, not only because its success is, as I have attempted to show, very desirable, but also because, after giving the subject much and earnest consideration, I am not apprehensive that its failure would be productive of any evil beyond the temporary postponement of a final arrangement of the mode of redeeming the debt. It is not made obligatory on the Secretary to issue these bonds, nor is he restrained from issuing others at six per cent., as authorized by existing laws. When this bill is finally passed, with such amendments as may be suggested and approved, he will have the precise conditions of the loan before him, and they will also be before the capitalists and investors of the country. He will then, better than now, be able to determine what prospect there is of making sale of the bonds; and I am very sure that unless this is entirely satisfactory he will not put them on the market. Besides, a failure to sell them will not indicate any deficiency of credit on the part of the Government, as it will be owing entirely to the character of the bonds. With these views I am still willing that the experiment shall be made.

I have not noticed so far the fourth section of the bill under consideration. It is not necessarily connected with what precedes it. I approve its object, and believe that in the place it now occupies, or by itself, it should speedily be enacted into a law, with, perhaps a slight amendment. I will not detain the Senate by further remarks upon it, but conclude by again urging upon its consideration the propriety of providing at this session for the total redemption of the national debt within a definite and not very protracted period, by a fixed annual appropriation, whether the particular plan I have indicated or some other, equally or more efficient, be adopted.

I now move to amend the third section of the bill by striking out after the word "least," in line seven, and inserting—

Ninety million dollars (including the saving of interest aforesaid) out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, shall be applied to the payment of the interest as it accrues and the reduction of the principal of the said debt by the purchase or redemption of the said bonds at not exceeding their par value, unless a greater rate is hereafter authorized by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the amendment, but as I agreed not to press a vote on the bill to-day I would rather that the amendment should be printed.

The amendment was ordered to be printed; and the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

PARIS UNIVERSAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 52, relating to the Paris Exhibition.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) to provide for the expenses attending the exhibition of the products of industry of the United States at the Exposition at Paris in 1867, was considered, as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) As the Committee on Foreign Relations have reported an amendment which is a substitute for the resolution, the substitute only will be read.

The Secretary read the reported substitute, as follows:

That in order to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition of the productions of agriculture, manufactures, and the fine arts, to be held at Paris in the year 1867, the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purposes severally specified, are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

1. To provide necessary furniture and fixtures for the proper exhibition of the productions of the United States according to the plan of the imperial commissioners, in that part of the building exclusively assigned to the use of the United States, $48,000.

2. For the compensation of the principal agent of the Exhibition in the United States, at the rate of $2,000 a year: Provided, That the period of such service shall not extend beyond sixty days after the close of the Exhibition, $4,000, or so much thereof as may be found necessary.

3. For office rent at New York, for fixtures, stationery and advertising; for rent of storehouse for reception of articles and products; for expenses of shipping, including cartage, &c.; for freights on the articles to be exhibited from New York to France and return, and for compensation of four clerks in conformity with the joint resolution approved on the 15th of January, 1866, and for contingent expenses, the sum of $33,700, or so much thereof as may be found necessary.

4. For expenses in receiving, boarding, storage, cartage, labor, &c., at Havre; for railway transportation from Havre to Paris, going and returning; for labor in the palace; for sweeping and sprinkling compartments for seven months; for guards and keepers for seven months; for linguists (eight men) for seven months; for storing, packing-boxes, carting, and for material for repacking; for clerk hire, stationery, rent, and contingent expenses, the sum of $35,703, or so much thereof as may be found necessary.

5. For the traveling expenses of ten professional and scientific commissioners, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, at the rate of $1,000 each, $10,000—it being understood that the President may appoint additional commissioners, not exceeding twenty in number, whose expenses shall not be paid.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Governors of the several States be, and they are hereby, requested to invite the patriotic people of their respective States to assist in the proper representation of the handiwork of our artisans and the prolific sources of material wealth with which our land is blessed, and to take such further measures as may be necessary to diffuse a knowledge of the proposed Exhibition, and to secure to their respective States the advantages which it promises.

Mr. HARRIS. At the end of the fifteenth line of the amendment, I move to insert the words "in coin;" so as to read, "$48,000 in coin."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. In the thirty-second line there is a misprint. The word "boarding" should be "bonding."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

Mr. HARRIS. In the forty-first line, after the word "dollars," I move to amend by inserting the words "in coin." These expenses are to be met in Paris.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. In line forty-eight at the end of section one I move to insert the words "but no person interested directly or indirectly in any article exhibited shall be a commissioner."

Mr. HOWARD. I really do not now see the necessity of such an amendment. Perhaps the Senator from New York can explain it. I do not see why an interest on the part of a commissioner in an article exhibited should be an objection to his acting as a commissioner.

Mr. HARRIS. It was thought by the committee that these commissioners should be entirely impartial, having no interest at all in the articles exhibited, no interest in any award of premiums that should be made, that they should be entirely disinterested, so that they could act upon juries if necessary.

Mr. HOWARD. The commissioners act in a sort of judicial capacity, then?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. Then it would be very right.

Mr. GRIMES. Is that same principle to extend to the wise men, the learned men, we are to send out?

Mr. HARRIS. These are the men.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer an amendment to insert at the end of the second section these words:

Provided, however, That no officers shall be appointed and no money paid under the provisions of this resolution, until the Imperial Government of France shall first give ample and reliable assurances to this Government that the French troops and all French military officers shall be immediately withdrawn from the just territorial jurisdiction of the republic of Mexico.

Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I confess that I do not see with great clearness the applicability of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Iowa to the joint resolution under consideration. I would like, therefore, very much to hear an explanation of the whole subject from the honorable Senator. I desire to hear his views upon the question of the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine and where it is at present.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that the whole question is in a nutshell. Every gentleman who has visited France since this Exposition has been projected, has returned to this continent entertaining the opinion which he has always expressed, that this whole Exposition was got up more for the purpose of glorifying the present Imperial Government of France than for any other purpose, and that it is for that reason that the younger Napoleon, the infant Napoleon, has been made the president of this Exposition. He is to occupy the prominent position, he is to be in the foreground in everything that is to be done.

Now, Mr. President, for my own part, representing a portion of the valley of the Mississippi river, interested somewhat in the connections that this Government may sustain toward its neighbors, I am not quite disposed to assist or to be in any way instrumental in accomplishing the object of the Imperial Government of France in this particular at any time, and especially not so long as their troops shall remain within the territorial jurisdiction of the republic of Mexico—troops, Mr. President, which would not have been sent there, as everybody knows, but for the difficulties that were occurring in this country at that time. They were sent out to take advantage of the unfortunate posture of public affairs in this country. I hear that the French Government have lately professed to be willing to withdraw their troops; but I have not yet had that assurance that they will withdraw them that I wish to have before I will agree to appropriate or assist in appropriating several hundred thousand dollars for this purpose.

I trust the Senator from Michigan understands fully the purpose that I have in view. I do not want to take part in this Exhibition at all; I do not want to assist in elevating in public estimation in any part of the world the present dynasty in France so long as it shall stand really, morally, and militarily, in an antagonistic position to this Government; and she does stand in that position so long as her troops remain in Mexico.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, Mr. President. But has the honorable Senator any doubt as to the earnest and confident expectation of the honorable Secretary of State that the French troops are about to be withdrawn from the territory of Mexico? Is he not entirely willing to rest his case upon the assurances which have been given us by that eminent gentleman that this most desirable result is about to take place? If he entertains these views why does he press this amendment to so simple a bill as this? Why make it a sort of condition precedent to our participating in the Paris Exposition that the French troops shall be withdrawn from Mexico? Is he not perfectly sure that his Majesty, the Emperor of the French, will withdraw the French troops from Mexico immediately?

Mr. GRIMES. In answer to the Senator from Michigan I will say that my faith is not as strong as one might suppose from his language that his was. I have not as much faith in the capacity of the Secretary of State as a prophet as I had some five or six years ago. But if France withdraws her troops there can no injury result to anybody by the adoption of this amendment. It will only prevent us from complicating ourselves in any such Exposition, or any such attempt to sanction the dynasty that now rules France, by sending these learned men, to be selected from the different parts of the country, who are to go there for the purpose of bringing back information, I suppose, and perhaps it may be that they will bring back some of the imperial ideas that are so prevalent in France to be disseminated around in the various localities from which they are to be selected.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, in January last we had a proposition before us to accept the invitation to take part in this Exhibition. A joint resolution came from the House of Representatives providing that the United States would accept the invitation, and take part in the Exhibition. According to my recollection, the Senator from Iowa made very much the same speech then that he has made now, and made very much the same opposition to that resolution that he makes now to this; and he called for the yeas and nays on the question of accepting that invitation, and, according to my recollection, he had five votes with him, perhaps six. And now having accepted it; having appointed our commissioner general in Paris; having appointed an agent in New York; having sent out invitations through all the States for the purpose of preparing for this Exhibition, and the invitations having been accepted, what is proposed? I read, a few days ago, four closely printed columns in the Tribune of the acceptances of invitations and sending articles for exhibition. Under these circumstances this resolution provides simply to pay the expenses. Are we not bound to go on with this thing, having accepted the invitation, having appointed our officers, having sent out invitations to all the States? Every State in the Union except the State of Delaware has now articles being sent forward for exhibition. Probably we shall have ten times as many articles as the space allotted to us in the Exhibition will accommodate, and we are obliged to discriminate. This resolution simply provides for paying the expenses.

Mr. GRIMES. It is true that I opposed the resolution to which the Senator alludes; but I do not know that it is exactly generous for the Senator from New York to taunt me with my want of influence in this body, by which I was only able to get four or five men to vote with me. It is very possible that he is correct as to what the number of votes was; but I will tell you in what I was correct. I told the Senate then that that was the mere entering wedge which would lead to the introduction of this very bill and others that would in the end deplete your Treasury, and I was replied to by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. SUMNER,] who represented the committee at that time, that I was mistaken about that. This bill came from the House of Representatives nearly three months ago. It has lain in the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the chairman of the committee being unwilling to report it—

Mr. HARRIS. You are mistaken.

Mr. GRIMES. Then all I have to say is that I have been misinformed.

Mr. HARRIS. It was reported on the 5th of April, by the chairman.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Massachusetts has suffered it to remain here for more than two months, unwilling to call it up. When he went away, two days ago, it came into the hands of the Senator from New York, and he uses precisely the argument that I told the Senate would be used when this bill came up, while the other one was under consideration, namely, that we had committed ourselves to it and that now there was no alternative for us but to go on and make appropriation after appropriation, no matter to what extent; and this is not the end of it. Every man knows that each one of these learned commissioners, when he returns, is going to make a voluminous report of what he saw in France, and that will be submitted to the Senate and House of Representatives, and we shall be called upon to print it, with extensive plates, diagrams, plats, maps, and everything of that kind, and we shall have $2,000,000 saddled upon us for public printing to print the reports of the learned gentlemen who are to go over there to glorify his Imperial Majesty Napoleon III, and the young man, the president of the Paris Exposition, the young Prince Imperial—

Mr. HOWARD. What is the age of the president of the Exhibition?

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from New York, I suppose, can inform me. I think about five years old.

Mr. COWAN. Thirteen, I believe.

Mr. GRIMES. Time passes so rapidly that I am hardly able to note it. It does not seem possible that he can be thirteen years old. I hardly think he is. He is somewhere, I should think, from five to eight years old, and I have no doubt that the very person of all the world, properly selected, considering the purposes that are to be subserved by this Exhibition, to preside over it.

But, Mr. President, I will make another prediction. I have no doubt this bill is going to pass. There is influence enough to pass it. But I predict that before we get through with this matter it will cost the Government two million dollars. You will have deficiency after deficiency, growing out of the transportation of these articles, the expenses attending these commissioners and the various classes of officers you authorize to be appointed; new officers will be created; new printing bills will be run up, and then finally to wind up the whole, you will be compelled to print the voluminous reports; these men will make just such reports as were made by Delafield and Mordecai and McClellan, when they went to see the Crimean war. They were instructed to go and examine the campaigns of the Russians and French. Major Mordecai's report is devoted almost entirely to the arsenals in Vienna and other places in the interior of Germany. These gentlemen when they cannot make out a sufficiently voluminous report—and a great many people imagine that the value of their report will be judged by its size—will go into other portions of the country and give us a history of their travels. All this will be sent here as part of the report, and the Senator from New York will rise with all the gravity and suavity that are so proverbial of the Senator and ask the Senate to print it, and we shall order it to be printed.

For my own part I am not disposed to embark in this scheme, and I desire to place my name on record in opposition to it.

Mr. CONNESS. My idea of the proper way of fighting French influence is not that suggested by the Senator from Iowa in his speech. This Exposition is of an industrial character; it is to be a great competition of the nations; and if the Prince Imperial, the heir to the French throne, shall gather laurels from it or strength from it either before the French people or the people of the nations of the earth, it must be only incidentally. I believe the Senator's amendment contemplates that no appropriation shall be expended or appointment made under this resolution until the French soldiers shall leave Mexico. The Emperor of France, who represents that Government, has agreed and stipulated with our Government that his soldiers shall leave there at a given time or times.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to ask the Senator from California most respectfully for the source of his knowledge on that subject. I am a stranger to any such stipulation between the two Governments, I must confess; and it is highly important that we should know the facts of the case. I doubt it.

Mr. CONNESS. I gather this information from a source equally open to the honorable Senator from Michigan; I gather it from the diplomatic correspondence that has already taken place between the two Governments. I undertake to say from what I have seen of that correspondence, that the word and the honor of the Emperor of France, and of the French nation through him—

Mr. GRIMES. That is not worth much.

Mr. CONNESS. We shall see what it is worth; but be it worth much or little, it is promised in the agreement that I have referred to that the French troops shall leave Mexico at certain stated times; our agreement on our part being, so far as the executive department of this Government could make one, that we will maintain a neutrality toward Mexico in the mean time. That is as I understand it. I think this is a fair statement of the case.

Mr. HOWARD. That we will maintain neutrality in regard to whom, between what belligerents?

Mr. CONNESS. In regard to the territory of Mexico and the contest that is transpiring there. That is as I understand it.

Mr. HOWARD. I have only to say that if that be the fact, I think it is very deserving of public censure.

Mr. CONNESS. I will not undertake to controvert the statement that the agreement may be deserving of public censure; but if the agreement be made and the faith of our Government is pledged in its behalf and for its execution, I am in favor of maintaining it; but I am also in favor of compelling, when the time shall come, the maintenance of the faith that has been pledged by the Emperor of France to this nation, and to the republic of Mexico through us, that his troops shall leave the territory of that country at the times agreed upon. I would not oppose the French army in Mexico by refusing to make this appropriation; but when the time shall come that the French soldiers shall remain in Mexico against the Emperor's promise to us, I am for driving them from the territory of Mexico by American arms. It is well that the notification should be given, and that it be understood that this is a pledge of the French nation and Government, and that we expect its execution at the proper time and in good faith.

Now, sir, I hope that there will be no opposition made to the opportunity that this great International Exposition will present for the competition of our industries with those of the nations of the earth.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I look upon this Industrial Exhibition as an exhibition which might take place, perhaps, even if a state of war were in existence between the Government of the United States and some of the nations who are invited to take part in it. But whatever may have been our relations heretofore with France growing out of the interference in Mexico, I think we have reason at the present time, at all events, to be assured that those relations are wearing a better aspect than they have done heretofore. Whether it be simply from policy, whether it be because Napoleon may have use for all his forces to be ready for the eventualities that may arise on the continent of Europe, or whether it be because Napoleon sees that the Republic of the United States is still undivided, still unbroken; whatever may be the policy, the principle, or the interest that controls him, I believe, from assurances that we receive now, that the French Government do intend to withdraw their expeditionary forces and all their forces from the republic of Mexico.

Not many days ago there was published a letter from the city of Mexico, which I have in my hand and from which I will read. I would not give any particular authority to an anonymous letter, but I have received a communication from a gentleman who is acquainted with the writer in the city of Mexico, and while it is not proper, under existing circumstances, that his name should be mentioned at the present time, still the assurance is given that the writer of this anonymous letter is a man who has the means of information and stands high in that country. I will read it:

CITY OF MEXICO, May 20, 1866.

General Bazaine has received orders from the French Minister of War, Marshal Randon, to immediately concentrate the French forces in Mexico, at the cities of Mexico, Puebla, and Orizaba, forming the principal camp at the latter place; to embark three fourths of the force in November and the remainder in March next; to not meditate any further movements against the Liberals, nor to attempt to reoccupy any place that has once been abandoned, even if the Liberals retake possession in the very act; and to give no more money to Maximilian—in a word, to bring the whole French expedition to an end by March of the coming year.

With reference to money, the situation is very bad indeed, as the following incident will show:

On the application recently of Maximilian to General Bazaine for further pecuniary supplies, the latter excused himself on the ground of orders from home. Maximilian then declared that he should abdicate and leave the country at once if more money was not furnished. Thereupon General Bazaine issued orders to the Paymaster General to deliver to the Imperial Government $500,000.

The Paymaster General, however, refused to obey, as he had received orders direct from the French Minister of Finance, Mr. Fould, not to give to Maximilian a single dollar more.

General Bazaine then sent an armed force, who broke open the safes and took the money. This scandal has caused a great excitement here, as it is almost a repetition of the act of Miramon and Marquez, in 1860, in breaking into the English legation and taking therefrom the money of the English bond-holders.

Where is all this to end, and where will matters stand when once the French army is withdrawn?

An officer of the French expeditionary corps, on being asked, after the occurrence of the foregoing events, what they came here for, replied, "To spend $180,000,000; to uselessly sacrifice the lives of our valiant soldiers, and to forfeit our national honor."

Could more truth have been expressed in so few words?

In military affairs the Liberals are doing well, and the situation is every day improving.

Mr. President, I have assurances that the writer of this letter is a man of high standing in Mexico, and that we can rely to a considerable extent upon the statement which is here made. We have seen in the newspapers that Austrian troops were to be sent into Mexico to take the place of the French troops as they should be withdrawn; but we have also seen from newspaper statements coming from over the water, as well as in our own country, that the United States Government has protested against any such proceeding; and a resolution which was passed this morning on my motion calls on the President to furnish, for the information of the Senate, the response of the Austrian Government. While, of course, I will not undertake to anticipate what the response may be, I believe that response will be such as to give us great satisfaction.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Wisconsin is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and is, of course, well informed upon all these questions, better informed than other members of the body.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the honorable Senator will not presume to catechise me upon that assumption.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not wish to have the Senator make the same statement that I do; it is enough for me that I have made it; I know that the Senator's modesty would restrain him from expressing any public concurrence, at any rate, in the judgment I have formed of him. But, Mr. President, the Senator has stated that he has assurances that a better condition of things exists on this subject than has existed, and that the French are about to withdraw from Mexico. I wish to know whether or not his opinion is predicated entirely upon the letter which he has read here. I have seen that statement. I want to know if there is anything outside of that, anything of a more official character, that he would be justified in sending before the country in order to quiet the public apprehension; for I am ready to say that there is a great deal more feeling on this subject of the occupation of Mexico by the French than many gentlemen are willing to acknowledge, or willing to recognize, at any rate.

I have seen it stated also, in addition to what the Senator has read, in newspaper paragraphs that while the French are being withdrawn, or are likely to be withdrawn, from Mexico, their military officers are going to be retained there to take the command of mercenaries who are to be raised on the continent of Europe to serve in Mexico to still undertake to uphold the authority of Maximilian. It was with a view to that that the amendment which I have proposed was drafted in the manner in which it is drawn, not only to include French troops proper, but to include any military officers who might belong to the French service, on half pay or otherwise, and who might be retained in Mexico to take command of troops.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not assume on this subject to have any more information than the honorable Senator himself. I simply state that I have assurance from a letter I have received from a gentleman who knows the writer of this letter, who states to me the name of the writer and his position; but for reasons which I think should control me in withholding the name from the public at the present time, I do not feel at liberty to state it. I say, however, that I feel assured that reliance, to some considerable extent at least, can be placed upon the situation as described by this gentleman writing from the city of Mexico; and I repeat what I said, that I believe our relations with France are wearing a better aspect than they did awhile ago.

I agree perfectly with the Senator from Iowa when he says that there is a deep feeling on this subject of the occupation of Mexico by the Emperor of the French with his troops. It is a feeling in which I have sympathized and in which I have felt very deeply myself; but I have waited and hoped, and hoped almost against hope at times, that I should see the French withdrawn from Mexico; when the people of Mexico should take the matter in their own hands, without our being involved in what might come on the Government of the United States, an actual conflict of our own. I desired to avoid that if possible and maintain friendly relations with Mexico and with France. At the same time, what might come from the continued occupation of Mexico by the French, I think almost any American could very well foresee. It was that which I desired to avoid and which I hope from the present aspect of affairs will be avoided, and we shall be saved from that responsibility which the nature of the case and our relations to Mexico might otherwise force upon us.

Mr. President, I hope that this joint resolution will pass without the amendment which the Senator from Iowa has proposed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. There is a large number of nominations to be referred.

Mr. RAMSEY. Does that involve the closing of the doors?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I am opposed to sit in this temperature. The thermometer has been eighty-three degrees here all day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 13, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to move that a substitute which I propose to offer for the bill (H. R. No. 543) to restore to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. SHELLABARGER indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, who was called home by the death of his father.

JONATHAN BALL.

Mr. MYERS. I move that, by unanimous consent, the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 550 for the relief of Jonathan Ball.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

The bill was read. It authorizes and empowers the Commissioner of Patents to proceed upon, determine, and decide the application of Jonathan Ball for the extension of his patent for "an improved mode of coating the interior side of metallic water-pipes with hydraulic cement," the same as though the said patent had not been extended once already; and to examine the said application and decide upon the same on the same evidence and in the same manner as in other cases where extensions of patents are applied for under existing laws, and without regard to the time when said application is made; provided that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to hold responsible any persons who may have made or used said invention between the expiration of the patent and the approval of this act.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, the report in this case is very full, but as it would take some time to read it, and as the committee were unanimous in favor of the report, I will briefly state the points involved. It is no disparagement to any other case to say that this application is more meritorious than any of its class upon which the committee have acted.

The patent is for lining metallic pipes with hydraulic cement so as to prevent the corrosion and incrustation, which take place with the old iron water-pipes. The committee had produced before it some of this patented pipe, which had lain in the ground for thirteen years, in the same condition as when laid down, while we had evidence that the old cast-iron pipe in use until lately was found when taken up after a few years only to be almost destroyed with rust.

It further appeared to the committee that until lately the inventor had little profit from his patent. His pipe had to lie for years before its merit could be tested, and so great was the prejudice in favor of the old iron pipes that bonds were compelled to be given running from five and twenty years against any loss by the use of this patented pipe. The committee think as the inventor has been in reality a great public benefactor, this extension should be granted. It will inure solely to his use. It was agreed to unanimously by the committee, and if there be no opposition, I shall demand the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. How long is the extension to run?

Mr. MYERS. It is for the usual extension. At the last session of Congress the Senate passed a bill granting this extension. It came here and only failed for want of time at the close of the session. The application was duly made before the patent had expired. The patent has now expired, and there is a proviso in the bill that no parties using it since the expiration are to be held responsible on that account.

Mr. UPSON. Is the only ground for granting a renewal of the patent that the inventor has made no money out of the invention?

Mr. MYERS. That is the chief reason. The public could not be induced at first to use this invention, and the patentee did not get the benefit of it for years. If I may use an expression which may appear contradictory, the advantages of the patent were necessarily "latent," hidden under ground for a long time. It could not be tested without so remaining for years; and we find not only that the inventor was poorly paid, but the invention was really valuable. Many public corporations have so certified, and there seems to be a general desire among them that the extension shall be granted.

Mr. UPSON. Has not one extension been already granted?

Mr. MYERS. By the Patent Office? Yes; and this is a congressional extension.

Mr. UPSON. It has already run for twenty-one years?

Mr. MYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. This bill is an old acquaintance of ours. I understood my friend from Pennsylvania to say that this bill was lost in this House last year for want of time.

Mr. MYERS. I said it passed the Senate at the last session, came to this House and was reported unanimously by the Committee on Patents, and we only failed to take it up at the close of the session for want of time.

Mr. DAWES. My friend must have been absent from the House at the time the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] reported the Senate bill and proposed to put it on its passage, for after fair discussion of its merits the only reason it failed was because the majority of the House came to the conclusion, after the patent had been in existence for twenty-one years and after the patentee and those holding under him—as I happen to know those holding under the patentee have, although I do not know about the patentee—have made large fortunes, no further extension should be granted. The company have laid up eighty-five per cent. of their capital. I happen to know that, because I took an interest in it.

I wish the House would settle upon some policy in reference to patents. This patent has run twenty-one years. It has been eminently a profitable one to those who have owned it or controlled it during the life of the patent. It is a patent that has been abundantly profitable, and I state upon information entirely reliable that notwithstanding the large dividends declared every year to the stockholders for many years, at the close of the last session, when the patent expired, and Congress failed to renew it after twenty-one years, they had a surplus of eighty-five per cent. of their entire capital.

Now, the invention has been open to the public for more than a year, and since that time the public has largely entered into the manufacture of this article. Large business interests have sprung up under it, and it is proposed now by action of Congress to give a further extension to this patent, another life to this monopoly. I think if gentlemen will consider the nature of this application, and the policy that they are about to adopt, they will hesitate before they extend this patent.

Parties who have gone on and invested their capital in the manufacture of the kind of article heretofore protected by this patent have had no notice that these parties would apply again to this Congress for an extension, after a hearing in the last Congress, before the expiration of the patent, and after it had been opened to the public by operation of law to every one to enter fully into the manufacture of the article. So far as I know, and so far as my constituents who are interested or have been for a long time engaged in the manufacture of this article are concerned, this is the first notice they have had of this application; and it is only by accident that I caught the name of the party a few moments ago.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] says that the rights of all these parties are secured by a saving clause in this bill. How are they saved? Is it proposed that all who have undertaken this business can go on hereafter freely to manufacture this article without the restraint of this patent; or is it proposed that what they have manufactured up to this time they may sell, but that hereafter they must either close their business and stop their work, or pay a royalty to the owners of the patent? If the former, then there is to be a patent reissued here which will be of no value to anybody. Everybody can freely manufacture without a royalty to anybody, side by side with the owners of the patent and of course it becomes of no value. If the latter, if the saving clause is to extend merely to what has been done in the interim, then it closes up workshops all over the country, or else compels parties to pay such royalty to the owners of the patent as their cupidity may require.

Now, I trust that the House will hesitate before it passes this bill. This Congress, within my experience, is the first Congress that ever extended beyond twenty-one years a patent, or authorized the Commissioner of Patents to extend a patent. And when a few days since I tried to call the attention of the House to a case of this kind, I was surprised to see with what ease and with what apparent indifference the House passed the bill, and established, so far as they could in this manner, the precedent of extending these patents, not only for the term allowed by law of twenty-one years, but beyond that time.

Large interests are being affected, not so much, perhaps, by the extension of such a patent as this, but by the precedents that are put forward here at this time to pave the way for very much larger interests to be trammelled and crippled by the extension of patents in this way, and I trust the House will not pass this bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, we are not yet in the morning hour, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not yet commenced.

Mr. STEVENS. A notice has been given that immediately after the morning hour the amendment to the Constitution would be taken up. I am very sorry that my colleague has introduced this bill before the morning hour. If that hour had commenced running I would have no objection. I now move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow in order that the morning hour may commence, so that after its expiration we may take up the constitutional amendment.

Mr. WARD. I would inquire if this bill will be the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be made the special order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MYERS. Before the vote is taken upon the motion to postpone I would inquire of the Chair in what position this bill will be placed if postponed, and when it will come up.

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the Chair to state when the bill will come up.

Mr. WARD. I think if this bill be postponed to accommodate other business it should be made the special order for some fixed time.

Mr. MYERS. I would appeal to my distinguished colleague [Mr. STEVENS] to withdraw that motion for a few minutes, as the discussion of this bill will not take ten minutes longer, and we will then have a vote upon it. It comes up properly now, and does not interfere with any other business.

Mr. STEVENS. I must insist upon my motion, upon which I call the previous question.

Mr. MYERS. Well, if it is the desire of the House that this bill should be postponed until to-morrow, I will withdraw my objection, if unanimous consent is given to its being the special order at that time.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I object to this bill being made the special order.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered.

The motion to postpone was then agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 406) to provide for the settlement of accounts of certain public officers.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEVENS and Mr. ELIOT called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of reports from committees during the morning hour. The first committee to be called at this time is the select committee on the civil service of the United States.

CIVIL SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. JENCKES, from the committee on the civil service of the United States, reported back House bill No. 160, to regulate the civil service of the United States; which was ordered to be printed and recommittees.

Mr. JENCKES also submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That the select committee on the civil service of the United States be authorized to procure from the heads of Departments and others in such service, and said officers are hereby required on the request of the committee to furnish such information concerning the mode of making appointments to the inferior grades of office in their respective Departments, and such suggestions of improvement therein as may aid said committee in considering plans for promoting the efficiency of said service.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The select committee on the Provost Marshal's Bureau, and the select committee on the Memphis riots were called for reports, but none were made.

The SPEAKER. By a former order of the House the standing Committee on Mines and Mining is to be called now, the select committees having all been called for reports.

MINING DITCHES, CANALS, ETC.

Mr. HIGBY. I am instructed by the Committee on Mines and Mining to report back House bill No. 365, granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners of the State of California over the public lands, with sundry amendments thereto. And I will ask that there be no interruption upon this subject until the amendments reported from the committee shall have been acted upon. Of course I will be willing to answer any questions relating to those amendments.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that the owners of ditches, flumes, canals, or aqueducts for mining, mechanical, or agricultural purposes, shall have the right of way over the public lands in the State of California so long as those works shall be used for said purposes.

The second section provides that in order to give free access to such canals, flumes, and ditches, for the purpose of repairs and construction, the owners of the same are granted the use and occupation of a strip of land on each side of their respective works three rods in width.

The third section provides that the owners of the ditches, flumes, and canals mentioned in the preceding sections may have the occupation and use of so much of the public land as may be required for reservoirs to collect and distribute water, not exceeding — acres of land for any one reservoir; but such parties are to be entitled to such use and occupation only so long as such lands shall be used for such purposes.

The first amendment reported by the committee was to strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That any company or individual who has heretofore, under and in accordance with the laws of the State, or the laws of the United States, constructed, or who may hereafter so construct, any ditch, flume, canal, or aqueduct for the conveyance of water for mining, mechanical, or agricultural purposes, is hereby granted to himself and his successor or successors in interest the right of way over the public land in the State, so long as such ditch, flume, canal, or aqueduct shall be used for the purposes named.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment reported by the committee was as follows:

Amend the second section by striking out the words "canals, flumes, and ditches," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "ditch, flume, canal, or aqueduct," also, by striking out the words "three rods in width" and inserting "fifty feet in width."

The amendment was agreed to.

The third amendment reported by the committee was to add to section two the following:

Provided, That the possessory rights of others to public lands adjoining such ditch, flume, canal, or aqueduct, previously acquired under the laws of the State or of the United States shall not be disturbed by the passage of this act: And provided further, That the use and occupation hereby granted shall be for the purpose named and no other.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. There is a blank in the last section in regard to the number of acres to be given for reservoirs. I move to fill the blank with the words "one hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I have another amendment which I desire to propose, not from the committee, however; therefore I call to it the attention of any members of the Committee on Mines and Mining who may be present. I move to add a proviso to the last section in regard to reservoirs, as it is not sufficiently guarded in other sections of the bill. The proviso is as follows:

Provided, That the possessory rights previously acquired under the laws of the State or of the United States for reservoir purposes shall not be disturbed by the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I would like to be allowed a few moments on this question, but I do not desire to occupy a great deal of the time of the House for this purpose. But it is proper that I should go on and explain to this House the object of this bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. Before the gentleman proceeds with his remarks I would ask him if it was not agreed upon in the Committee on Mines and Mining that the States of Nevada and Oregon should be included in this bill.

Mr. HIGBY. Those States are included in the amendment of the title which I propose to submit, which will be after we get through the body of the bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. I think they should be included in the body of the bill as well as in the title.

Mr. HIGBY. The substitute for the first section was intended to include the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada.

The SPEAKER. The substitute for the first section, upon which the House has already acted, reads, "the laws of the State or the laws of the United States."

Mr. HIGBY. That is a clerical omission, then. I move to amend so that it will read "the laws of either of the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, or the laws of the United States," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. The object of this bill is to preserve to those companies and individuals who have constructed ditches and flumes over the mineral lands of the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada to a very large extent the right of way over the public land, and that they shall be protected in the property which they have created to such a vast amount. It is a fact well known to this House that the mineral lands have not been in market for sale. The right of eminent domain having been held by the Government of the United States, yet for seventeen years the people of the United States have been permitted by the Government to go upon those lands for the purpose of extracting the precious minerals which they contain. In order to work those mines with success it became an absolute necessity that water should be carried at great expense through artificial channels over the public lands.

And up to this time money to the amount of millions of dollars has been invested in the construction of these canals and flumes. I have before me the report of the surveyor general of the State of California, in which, among other things, is given the number of miles of ditches and flumes and canals which have been constructed in the mining districts of that State. And on footing up what has been reported to him, I find that we have more than thirty-five hundred miles of canals and ditches. I know that all are not embraced in that report. I know that in the county of Amador, the county adjoining the one in which I reside, there are over one hundred miles of ditches, of which none is included in that report. And the estimate of the value of these ditches there given is too low, because of the fall of the value of property in the mining districts. I know that millions have been expended in the construction of these ditches and canals, and millions are yet to be extracted from the public lands.

We propose, in the bill as amended, that they shall have the right of way as they now have, respecting at the same time the rights of possession as established by the laws of the State. The customs, rules, and regulations of miners have been recognized as law by the State legislation and by the decisions of the Supreme Court; and we propose that the possession which has been acquired under the rules, regulations, and laws of the State shall remain as at present; that the property shall be undisturbed; and that the right of way shall be guaranteed by the General Government so long as these ditches, &c., shall be used for the purposes named in the bill. In other words, it is provided that the General Government shall extend the same security that has always been extended to this kind of property under the rules and regulations of the miners and the legislation of these several States; so that if this land should come into the market and be sold the buyers shall respect the right of way over the land secured to these parties. I have thus stated the objects of the bill; and unless some gentleman desires to make an inquiry, I see no necessity for saying anything further.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to ask the gentleman from California why the privileges secured by this bill should not be extended to the Territories.

Mr. HIGBY. The reason is that the Committee on Territories have this same question under consideration with reference to the Territories, and will report a bill upon that subject. Our committee, embracing some of the members of the Committee on Territories, have thought it best that this bill should be confined to the States, allowing a suitable measure for the Territories to be matured by the appropriate committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. It seems to me that if this measure be right for the States it is equally proper for the Territories, and that the latter should be embraced in the same bill.

Mr. HIGBY. I have stated the reasons on which our committee acted. The committee having specially in charge the interests of the Territories will at a suitable time report a measure of this nature for the Territories.

Mr. Speaker, I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to amend the title of the bill so that it will read, "An act granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the title was amended; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed House bills of the following titles, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 492) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under authority of law, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 477) further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes.

LABORATORY AND MINING ASSOCIATION.

Mr. STROUSE, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported back, with an amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 93) to incorporate the Washington Laboratory and Mining Association.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following:

And provided further, That the charter of incorporation granted to the said Washington Laboratory and Mining Association shall be limited to twenty years, and may at any time be amended or repealed by Congress.

Mr. WARD. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. STROUSE. It has. We have had the bill under consideration for a long time. It is only to incorporate in the District of Columbia a company for practical purposes. It is for the establishment of a chemical laboratory here in this city.

I will say further, this company is limited in time and in capital, and I do not see how there can be any substantial objection to it. We have incorporated many companies at this session which will be of less benefit to the country.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will this company be confined in its operations to this District or will it, when incorporated, be enabled to do business generally throughout the country?

Mr. STROUSE. The title of the bill is "The Washington Chemical and Mining Association." There is a section in the bill which permits them to send scientific men for the purpose of examination throughout the States and Territories. It does not form them into a general mining company. Nothing in the bill could be tortured into any such meaning.

Mr. ROSS. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer the following amendment:

Provided further, That the business of said corporation shall be confined to the District of Columbia, and that the said stockholders shall be individually liable for all debts and liabilities of said company.

Mr. STROUSE. I cannot yield for the introduction of that amendment. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The question recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I demand tellers. The House does not understand this matter.

It was reported unanimously by the Committee on Mining.

Mr. WARD. I object, unless both sides can be heard.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WARD and STROUSE were appointed.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 70.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSAY OFFICES.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back House bill No. 81, to relocate the branch mint in the State of Oregon, and the memorial of the Legislature of Idaho, praying for a branch mint and assay office at Boise City; which were laid upon the table.

Mr. ALLISON, from the same committee, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time:

A bill to establish additional offices for the assay of gold and silver, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to establish assay offices of the United States, for the receipt and for the melting, assaying, and stamping of gold and silver, at Portland, Oregon, and at Boise City, in the Territory of Idaho, and that the sum of $50,000 be appropriated for carrying the provisions of this section into effect.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That for each of said assay offices, as soon as the public interest shall require their service, the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one superintendent, one assayer, and one melter; and the said superintendent may employ as many clerks, subordinate workmen, and laborers, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, as may be required. The salaries of the said officers and clerks shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Director of the Mint; and to the subordinate workmen and laborers such wages shall be paid as may be determined by the superintendent of the mint and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the officers and clerks to be appointed under this act, before entering upon the execution of their offices, shall take an oath or affirmation before some judge of the United States, or of the supreme court of a Territory as now provided by law, and faithfully and diligently to perform the duties of their offices, and shall each become bound to the United States of America with one or more sureties to the satisfaction of the Director of the Mint or the Secretary of the Treasury, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of their offices.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the business of said offices shall be under the general control and direction of the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and for that purpose it shall be the duty of the said Director to prescribe such regulations, and to require such returns, and to establish such charges for melting, assaying, and stamping as shall appear to him to be necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That said assay offices shall be places of deposit for such public moneys as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct. And the superintendent of an assay office, who shall perform the duties of treasurer thereof, shall have the custody of such moneys, and also perform the duties of Assistant Treasurer; and for that purpose shall be subject to the provisions contained in an act entitled "An act to provide for the better organization of the Treasury, and for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," approved August 6, 1846, which relates to the Treasury and to the branch mint at New Orleans.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners of any gold or silver, in bullion, dust, or other form, or of any foreign coin, shall be entitled to deposit the same in any of said offices; and the superintendent thereof shall give a receipt, stating the weight and description of such gold or silver bullion, dust, or coin, as aforesaid, in the manner and under such regulations as are or may be provided in like cases of deposits at the Mint of the United States with the treasurer thereof. And such bullion, dust, or foreign coin shall, without delay, be melted, assayed, and cast into bars or ingots; and a stamp shall be put upon each, of such form and device as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, accurately designating its weight and fineness; and in this form the bullion shall be returned to the depositor, upon payment by him of the proper charges for melting, assaying, and stamping, not exceeding the cost thereof, or in lieu thereof, as he may choose, he shall receive a certificate or certificates for the net value thereof, issued by the superintendent, in such denomination and form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, which shall be payable in coin or like metal as that originally deposited at the Mint in Philadelphia, or at the branch mint of the United States at San Francisco, and shall be receivable in payment of all debts due to the United States.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws now in force for the regulation of the Mint of the United States and its branches, and for the government of officers and persons employed therein, and for the punishment of all offenses connected therewith, shall be in full force in relation to the assay offices by this act established, so far as the same may be applicable thereto.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act to establish a branch mint of the United States at Dallas City, in the State of Oregon," approved July 4, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to dispose of or remove, wholly or in part, the property, buildings, and machinery belonging to the United States, and erected for the purposes of a branch mint, at the town of Charlotte, in the State of North Carolina, and also the property, buildings, and machinery used for like purposes at Dahlonega, in the State of Georgia, upon such terms and conditions as he may deem advisable. And he may authorize the retention of such portion of said property, buildings, and machinery at either of said places, as may be necessary for the purpose of assaying metals, as provided by this act, if in his judgment such office or offices are necessary.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon for twenty minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I perceive that the committee has reported in favor of an assay office in the State of Oregon instead of the removal of the branch mint there. I have no doubt that the policy proposed to be pursued by the committee in general is correct; that is, to establish assay offices in the different localities instead of branch mints. But, sir, there are certain localities where this policy should not be carried out. There are certain points that demand from their natural location the establishment of branch mints, while other positions would be well suited for the establishment of assay offices. And I will say to you that Portland, in Oregon, is one of those points that demand the establishment of a branch mint. An assay office will not answer the demands of commerce of that station. Consequently I am under the necessity of objecting to that feature which proposes to substitute an assay office.

Mr. Speaker, we have a large country, extending from ocean to ocean, and from the Lakes in the North to the Gulf in the South; more than three thousand miles from east to west, and more than two thousand miles from north to south, with an extensive variety in climate, soil, and productions; one section adapted to one kind of business, a second to another, and a third to something else. Maine has her fisheries, lumber, &c., Vermont her grazing and wool-growing, Massachusetts her manufactures, Pennsylvania her iron and coal, Louisiana her sugar and cotton, Illinois her agriculture, California her mines, commerce, and vineyards, and Oregon her agriculture, commerce, and mines. Each has its peculiar interests and necessities; and I take it as an admitted fact that the people of each section understands its own local wants best; or shall we take the ground that the people of some particular sections not only understand their own wants best, but those of everybody else? Shall we, the members of this Congress, sanction the doctrine that the people of certain portions of our country are not only to judge of their own local interests, but those of all others?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I most heartily detest and repudiate this whole theory of special rights and special privileges. I most heartily and cheerfully accord to the people of the different States and sections of our common country the right to judge of their own necessities, sufferings, and remedies. I have freely cast my vote here in favor of measures of large expense to the General Government that I did not consider to be of the slightest possible advantage to the State and people that I have the honor to represent on this floor. But, sir, I consider that the wants and wishes of the people of other sections are to be regarded as well as those of my own. I recognize the equality of their rights, the superiority of their advantages for judging in the case, and their equal claims to honesty and credit in the matter. This Government is not intended to foster and protect the interests of one section more than another, but each and every one alike. The State of Oregon, far off from this capital as she is, has just as many rights in this Government as any State in the Union. I most cheerfully concede to Pennsylvania the right to shape legislation in reference to her iron, coal, and general interests, and to New York her commerce, immigration, &c., and to every other State the same right to promote and protect its own peculiar welfare. This, however, is to be so accomplished as not to damage others more than it benefits itself. Now, Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted also that the correctness of the principles I have here laid down is admitted—that there is no controversy upon them.

More than three years ago the Legislature of the State of Oregon petitioned Congress to establish a branch mint at the city of Portland, in that State. The first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress passed an act for the location and establishment of a branch mint of the United States at Dalles City, in Oregon, one hundred miles distant from Portland, and on the east side of the Cascade range of mountains, and appropriated $100,000 for the erection and establishment of the same. Why the prayer of the people of that country was disregarded I have never learned. The result was, as might have been anticipated, the people were disappointed and displeased. From different or several considerations the Secretary of the Treasury has not as yet ordered the execution of the law in its establishment; so the work has not been commenced. The Legislature of Oregon, at its last session, again prayed Congress to relocate the mint, to place it at Portland, the great commercial emporium for the valley of the Columbia, the second largest river in North America. Portland bears precisely the same relation to the valley of the Columbia that New Orleans does to the valley of the Mississippi. A bill was accordingly introduced at the last session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress for its removal to Portland, but it was permitted to sleep itself to death in the committee, and the people were again disappointed and mortified.

At the commencement of the present session of Congress I received a certified copy of a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, once more praying this honorable body to render that important facility to our extensive and growing commerce. I accordingly, at an early day in the present session, introduced a bill for the purpose, which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and this short bill, of one section, has lain in the hands of that committee some four or five months, and now, after all the pleading and urging that a modest man like myself felt justified in employing, the committee comes forth with a bill proposing to give us—what? the mint at Portland, as we have prayed for it for years? No; but an assay office, and repealing the mint bill altogether.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to speak a word in disparagement of the committee that has reported this bill. Individually, I have a high personal regard for them. I appreciate their talents and kindness of heart, and they have my sympathies in the perplexities they have had to endure in performing the Herculean labors of the Committee of Ways and Means; but they have committed an egregious error in proposing to take the mint, that meager bit of tardy justice, from the people of the growing, promising, and important young State of Oregon. Why should their hopes be thus tantalized and trifled with? Are their rights less sacred than those of other portions of the Union? What crime have the people of loyal Oregon committed that they should be thus snubbed by a loyal Congress? But it may be said that an assay office is as good as a mint. I answer, that may be so, but we do not see it in that light; and even if it was far better, that is not what we ask for. We ask for a mint, and we claim to know our own wants infinitely better than those who were never within three thousand miles of the country. I repeat it emphatically, that we, the people of the Columbia valley, know what we want. And when we ask for an assay office, then we will thank Congress to give us one; but when we ask for a mint, we mean a mint. The Great Teacher proposed this question: "If a son ask of his father bread, will he, for bread, give him a stone; or if he ask a fish, will he, for a fish, give him a serpent?" We ask bread, but you offer us a stone. If the people of any portion of the United States ask for an assay office in preference to a mint, I say, by all means give it to them; and no member here will vote more cheerfully to comply with their wishes than I will; but when an organized and self-sustaining State like Oregon asks for a mint, do not attempt to force an assay office upon it.

It has been said by some that we have no need of a mint, that all we want is the $100,000 appropriated for erecting the necessary buildings to expend at some particular place. I reject the mean insinuation with disdain. What do we care for the pitiful sum of $100,000, when we are, right from the city of Portland, flooding this whole nation with gold at the rate of a million and a half to two millions per month? As far as the collection and dispensing of gold is concerned, the city of Portland is now fulfilling the same functions for the nation that the heart performs for the body. The blood finds its way through a thousand veins from the surface to the heart, and then is thrown out through the arteries to all the extremities, refreshing and strengthening every part. So the gold is pouring into Portland through ten thousand small streams from the various mining camps, and then is thrown out through the different express lines to the extremities of the nation, replenishing and sustaining all. What do we care for the contemptible sum appropriated for building the mint? Nothing at all. All we want is the authority from the United States to coin our own gold and silver into legal currency of the Government. We claim that it is our moral right and legitimate business to reduce our metals from their crude state to a circulating medium at home. Where is the justice of taking this business of coinage out of our hands and sending it to others, thousands of miles distant, to create business for them at our loss? Congress has just as much moral right to say that the people of Oregon shall not manufacture their wool, but put it up in bales and send it to Lowell to be manufactured, and thereby create business for the people of Massachusetts, as to say that we shall not coin our own gold and silver, but we may run it into bars and send them to Philadelphia to be coined there, to create business for the benefit of a set of officials and laborers at that point.

To show that an assay office will not answer our purpose in that country, let us suppose that a citizen buys up a drove of beef cattle on time, from fifty or a hundred different persons, drives to the mines and sells out to the miners for "dust," (as miners are not expected to have anything else to buy with;) he returns down the Columbia to Portland with his fifty pounds of "dust," calls at the assay office and gets it run into "bars and ingots," "marked and stamped." Now, sir, how is he to pay off his creditors with these slugs? Or suppose a citizen buys up a drove of a hundred pack animals, lades them with the produce of the country, flour, bacon, fruit, lard, butter, eggs, &c., purchased from scores of different persons, drives to the mines, peddles all out to the miners of various camps, returns with his "dust" to the assay office, gets his bars and ingots; now, sir, how is he to pay off his hundred creditors who are anxiously awaiting his return? And I now inform the members of this House that this kind of commerce and traffic is pouring in one continual stream from the agricultural to the mining regions; pack animals, road wagons, and steamboats throng the route for hundreds of miles in this trade.

Now, sir, how will an assay office meet the wants of such commerce? Your had about as well give us Lysurgus's iron money, and then furnish ox carts to transport it. But it may be said that we may deposit our "dust" at the office and take a certificate; but I ask how much better will that answer as a circulating medium than bars and ingots? Not a whit. The dust, with all its waste and inconvenience, is incomparably better than either of them. It is said we may sell our certificates, bars, or ingots—at a discount and a loss; as a matter of course brokers will not buy except for speculation.

If there is a spot in America that the laws of nature and of commerce point out as the proper place for the location and establishment of a branch mint of the United States, that place is Portland, in the State of Oregon. We want no assay office; we want no stamped and marked ingots; we want no certificates of deposit as a circulating medium; we want our gold and silver coined into lawful money. Give us that or nothing. And I now, as the Representative of the intelligent, industrious, enterprising, and loyal people of the State of Oregon, respectfully reject the offer of an assay office, and in the name of justice and equality demand the establishment of the branch mint at the city of Portland, where the fourfold interests of agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and mining all call for it.

As an evidence of the amount of business done at that place, I will inform the House that there are nine gentlemen in that city who pay over $18,000 of special income tax annually, and the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, whose headquarters are at Portland, have one warehouse on the river nine hundred feet long by some thirty or forty feet wide.

But it is said the Superintendent of the Mint at Philadelphia and the Secretary of the Treasury recommend the establishment of assay offices for our benefit. Now, sir, I inquire, in the name of common sense and common propriety, whether they are qualified to judge of our wants and necessities. Things are very different upon that coast from this. When you cross the summit of the Rocky mountains gravitation turns; the rivers run the other way, the climate is different, soil and productions different; water, timber, beasts, birds, and fishes, all different; occupations, trade, and commerce, all different. Then how improper the idea of calling upon heads of Departments here to learn whether we, of a country three thousand miles distant, need the establishment of a new land office, the opening of a military road, or the establishment of a branch mint at a given point. If gentlemen desire information in reference to our necessities in that country let them apply to our Senators and Representatives from that coast, who are here for the express purpose of affording such information.

If Congress sees proper to establish assay offices for the Territories under her immediate control, all right; I have nothing to say; but I hope they will not so treat the State of Oregon. We are not minors, but of age, and claim the right to choose for ourselves; when we desire the advice of Government officials we will be thankful to receive it; but in reference to our wants upon the Pacific we feel that we are much better qualified to judge of our wants and that we are equally as honest as they.

Neither do we think that branch mints ought to be established at every town and mining camp in the country, but at great centers, where the laws of nature and commerce unmistakably point them out. And such is the city of Portland, in Oregon, nearly one thousand miles distant from any branch mint of the United States, and it the center of trade for a great and growing commercial country. Portland is situated at the head of ocean navigation, upon the second largest river in North America; enjoying by steam the commerce of the world, an internal or river navigation of thousands of miles, at the junction of the Columbia and Willamette valleys; the one embracing the most extensive and rich mining region on the globe; the other combining more of the real elements of wealth, health, and happiness than any country of which I ever heard or read. It might well be called "Los Angeles," the land of angels. In the amount and quality of its agricultural products to the acre, I believe it stands unrivaled and alone; in the health and rapid increase of its useful animals I know of no country that equals it. Its manufacturing resources are unbounded; its abundant and immense water power, its extensive and inexhaustible forests of timber, its extensive beds of iron all ready for use.

The city of Portland already contains some ten thousand inhabitants, with a rapid increase; and I repeat the statement that it bears the same relation to the valley of the Columbia that New Orleans does to the valley of the Mississippi. Between this point and San Francisco a tri-monthly line of steamers regularly ply; here, too, ends the great overland daily stage line from Omaha City, by way of Sacramento, to the Columbia river. Here also ends the railroad survey from Lincoln, in California, which is but an extension of the great Union and Central Pacific railroad. Through this city passes the telegraph wire which is to bring this capital within speaking distance of the capital of Russia, over which now flashes the history of our daily labors in this Hall to the reading-room in the Lincoln House in Portland with as much regularity as we meet and adjourn. Here, too, is to end the southern branch of the great Northern Pacific railroad, over which in a few years Europeans will be passing with their valuable merchandise to and from India and China. This city is the natural depot of supplies for all the mines west of the crest of the Rocky mountains. From this point they draw their clothing, provisions, and tools, and here their quartz mills are manufactured; and you might as well undertake to change the channel of the Columbia river as to turn the trade and commerce of its valley from that point. These facts prove that the vast commercial interests of that country will soon compel the establishment of a branch mint at Portland, in Oregon.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over till the morning hour of to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses in reference to joint resolution of the House No. 134, relative to appointments to the Military Academy of the United States.

Also, that the Senate had concurred in the amendments of the House to Senate joint resolution No. 51, respecting bounties to colored soldiers, and the pensions, bounties, and allowances to their heirs.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. I move now that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as the first business on the table the consideration of joint resolution of the House No. 127, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, that portion of the joint committee which is composed of the Union members of this House have examined the amendments which have been made by the Senate, and are unanimously of opinion that they ought to be adopted by the House. I do not desire myself to discuss this question, the amendments are so slight, and unless there are gentlemen on the other side of the House who desire to discuss the question, we would be willing to take a vote upon it at once. If, however, there are any gentlemen on that side of the House who wish to be heard, I would suggest that, by unanimous consent, the speeches be limited to fifteen minutes each, and that the time shall not be extended upon any motion which may be made. I am willing to say twenty minutes, if that is preferred.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no; fifteen minutes.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. How many speeches is it proposed to allow?

Mr. STEVENS. I will say, furthermore, that it is my intention to call the previous question at three o'clock, or at furthest at half past three, so as to have the vote taken by four o'clock. I then propose that the speeches shall be fifteen minutes in length.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Is the gentleman willing to allow to this side of the House an hour, to be divided according as we may agree?

Mr. STEVENS. I think there will be no objection to allowing that side of the House to occupy one hour, and they may distribute it among themselves as they may agree. If not, I propose that fifteen minutes be the length of the speeches, and I hope that will be unanimously agreed to.

Mr. FINCK. I hope it will be the understanding that if we are to have but one hour we may divide it as we see fit, so as not to limit the speeches to fifteen minutes, unless we have more than three speeches.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen on both sides of the House had better agree upon the division of the time.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentlemen do not agree upon it then let each one be confined to fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I suppose that it is not required of us on this side, inasmuch as we are impotent to object, that we shall consent to the gentlemen on the other side of the House dividing the Union just exactly as they see fit. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, sir. I did not intend to do so.

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Speaker, there are some bills on the Speaker's table that ought to be referred so that the committees may be able to act upon them. There is one that I desire to have referred, and I hope there will be no objection.

LAND TITLES IN CALIFORNIA.

On motion of Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 343, to grant land titles in California, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SMUGGLING.

On motion of Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 223, further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAUL S. FORBES.

On motion of Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, joint resolution (S. No. 99) for the relief of Paul S. Forbes under his contract with the Navy Department for building and furnishing the steam sloop-of-war Idaho, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CHARLES W. McCORD AND GEORGE W. BESTOR.

Mr. HOGAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Charles W. McCord and George W. Bestor; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee of Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. COOPER, his Private Secretary, communicated to the House sundry messages in writing.

The message further informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 255) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense, for the year ending June 30, 1867;

An act (H. R. No. 281) to amend the postal laws; and

An act (H. R. No. 15) authorizing documentary evidence of title to be furnished to the owners of certain lands in the city of St. Louis.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. ROGERS here addressed the House. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, as I am the only Representative that the young, growing, and interesting State of Oregon has on this floor, I feel it my duty to ask the indulgence of the House while I submit the views I entertain on the great subject now under consideration. After the most careful investigation I have been able to give the matter, and all I have heard on it, I am constrained to believe that the whole difficulty in the way of disposing of the case grows out of the want of a correct knowledge of the relation the States lately in rebellion now sustain to the General Government. Are they in the Union or out of it? If in, in what sense? When a physician is called to minister to the welfare of a patient, in order that he may act beneficially he must understand the nature of the disease and what has caused it. So Congress can never act wisely and successfully in the work of reconstruction until we understand the exact status of the States lately in rebellion against the General Government and what caused the present condition of things.

In order that we may have a correct idea of the existing condition of those States, let us inquire what constitutes a State; let us analyze the composition of a State. There are four entities that enter into the organism of every State. Take away any one of them, and the State ceases to exist as such. First, there must be territory; second, there must be inhabitants; third, there must be a constitution and laws; fourth, there must be the necessary officers to carry these laws into execution. These are all essential to the existence of a State, and if you remove one the State ceases. Is not this true?

In the next place, let us inquire how a State becomes a member of the Union: first, it must present a constitution and laws in harmony with the Constitution and laws of the United States; second, the inhabitants of such Territory must express their desire for such Union through the proper channel; third, the consent of Congress must be given in a formal act. Is not this also true?

In the next place, let us inquire what are the consequences of such a union. First, the new States assume certain obligations and the General Government is relieved of certain duties and responsibilities; the new State acquires certain rights and privileges, and the General Government yields certain rights and prerogatives—the general result is, that the Federal Government has parted with just as much authority as the new State has gained by the union. The new State now stands upon an "equal footing" with the original States. But let it not be supposed that the General Government surrendered all her rights and prerogatives in such new State; far from it. It still retains the power to lay duties and collect taxes; to regulate commerce among the States; to regulate the currency; to establish post offices and post roads, &c.; Congress still retains these and other enumerated powers in all the States.

Let us next inquire what are the results of a rebellion against the General Government by one or more of the States of the Union: first, the States rebelling and throwing off the Constitution and laws of the United States, and making war against them, forfeit all the rights and privileges they acquired by coming into the Union; second, all these forfeited rights and privileges naturally and necessarily revert back to the source from which they came—the General Government. These conclusions are so natural and philosophical that I think no man will dispute them. Those rebel States staked all the rights that they held by the consent of the General Government at the commencement of the rebellion for the chance of what they could obtain by force; and being conquered, they justly and rightfully lost all.

Now, sir, at the time of the surrender of Lee's army, in what condition do we find them?

As organized States, enjoying all the rights and privileges of States that had never rebelled? Have they constitutions and laws that the General Government is bound to respect? Nothing of the kind, sir. Did these conquered provinces still have the right to hold and treat men and women as slaves? Did Virginians still have the right to make merchandise of their own sons and daughters, as formerly? Did the President of the United States recognize the existence of their corps of State officers? No, sir; President Johnson recognized the existence of neither governor, judge, nor marshal among them, but rightfully and properly ignored and rejected the idea of a State officer in all rebellion, and went to work and appointed temporary officers to act for the time being. The moment these States fired the first gun against the flag of the Union their State governments tumbled into nonentity; and if the rebellion had been squelched in four months instead of four years, the results as to their State governments would have been the same.

Now, sir, can a State government exist four years without an officer to execute its laws? If it can, how many years can it not exist without officers? Then, sir, if the position taken at the outset be correct, that a State cannot exist without officers to execute its laws, I have demonstrated that there was no State government in any of those Territories at the close of the rebellion; and as a matter of course they were not then in the Union as States, nor are they yet in the Union as such. I know that the question arises here, "What became of the rights of those who remained loyal in those Territories if their rights as States were all forfeited?" I answer, their natural rights remain, but their political rights for the time being all went down with their governments. This is their misfortune, and not the fault of the General Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that the status of these so-called States is perfectly clear. As States they are out of the Union, having lost some of the essential elements of a State, and also having forfeited all their rights as such; but as Territories they are in the Union. Gentlemen on the other side of the House claim that if these Territories are not in the Union as States, then the Union is dissolved. This assertion is ridiculously absurd. Did not the Union once exist with but nine States, and afterwards with thirteen? Now, sir, if it then existed with these numbers can it not now exist with twenty-three States?

The loyal States did not prosecute the war for the purpose of sustaining State governments. Ask the tens of thousands of patriot soldiers who left wives and children that they loved dearer than life and went into the swamps and fens of the southern States, fought upon a hundred battle-fields and languished in prisons and camps, what they made this terrible sacrifice for; would they answer, "to sustain State governments?" No, sir; not a bit of it. What did they care whether the tyrannical government of South Carolina, or the barbarous government of Virginia was sustained or not? They fought for no such paltry purpose; but they did fight, and the heroes who now fill honored graves died, to sustain national authority in all those territories. That is what the war was waged to sustain, not State governments. I ask gentlemen on the other side of the Hall if that was a failure. Is any part of the United States territory now under a foreign government? No, thank God! the stars and stripes, surmounted by the American eagle, now wave triumphantly over every foot of soil the United States ever owned. The General Government holds and exercises all the prerogatives now that it held in those States before the rebellion, and also all forfeited by them. The rebels have all they acquired by the rebellion and all the General Government has conceded to them since its suppression, and no more.

In view of the foregoing facts in reference to those States lately in rebellion, I arrive at the following conclusions: First, that they are not in the Union as States. Second, that they are in it as Territories. Third, that rebels have no rights except those conceded to them since their subjugation. Fourth, that Congress may rightfully and lawfully dispose of all those Territories as she thinks proper, under two restrictions, namely: first, must secure to all that may be organized into States a "republican form of government;" second, must respect the private rights of the loyal inhabitants. Fifth, rebels have no just grounds for complaints while their lives are spared to them, as they staked rights, property, and life itself upon the chances of war and lost all. Sixth, that Congress has a perfect right to admit them or any of them to the enjoyment of State privileges now, at some future period, or never, as she may judge best calculated to promote the general welfare.

Now, Mr. Speaker, whether these statements and conclusions are all correct or not, they are the honest convictions of my heart, and I believe them true as certainly as I believe that God lives; consequently, I shall vote most heartily and cheerfully for the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. PINCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose any words I may utter on this occasion will arrest the predetermined action of the large majority of this House, but I propose to call the attention of the House and the country, in a few remarks, to the strange spectacle which is now being exhibited by the Representatives of only a portion of the States of this Union. What do we see? A determined and persistent effort to exclude from the national Legislature the Representatives of eleven States. We see a majority of the Representatives of the twenty-five States here represented saying, in a proposed amendment to the Constitution, to be followed up by legislation, to the eleven States which are unrepresented, that they shall never come within these walls unless they consent to and adopt all the conditions which shall be imposed by this majority of the twenty-five States.

More than this, and I say it here because I have the firm conviction that it is true; the majority on this floor represent to-day a minority of the people of the United States. Take my own State, Ohio, with one hundred and ninety-four thousand Democratic voters at the election last October. She has on this floor but two members representing that immense vote, while the two hundred and twenty-four thousand who voted the Republican ticket for Governor Cox in 1865 have seventeen Representatives on this floor, and in the Senate they have both members. If a fair vote of the people of Ohio were taken to-day as to whether the restoration policy of the President or the obstruction policy of the radicals of this Congress should be sustained, I believe a majority of the people of Ohio would be in favor of sustaining the policy of the President and of the two Democratic Representatives of that State on this floor.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the time to make amendments to the Constitution.

Time will not allow me to examine the whole of this proposition, and I will confine my remarks to the second and third sections. Now, what is proposed by the second section of this amendment? The purpose of the section is to reduce representation in this House in all the States which exclude the negro from voting. To exclude from the count the entire colored population of the States whose constitutions or laws may deprive these people of the right of suffrage. While this section admits the right of the States thus to exclude negroes from voting, it says to them, if you do so exclude them they shall also be excluded from all representation; and you shall suffer the penalty by loss of representation. It seeks to do by indirection that which gentlemen shrink from doing in a direct manner, namely, to compel the States to adopt negro suffrage. Why do you not present this question in an open and square way, and make the issue of negro suffrage direct before the people?

What is to be the effect of this amendment?

In order to avoid the effect of this proposition before the people at the coming October and November elections, you have worded it in the manner in which it is presented to this House so as to enforce, if possible, through motives of interest, negro suffrage in those States where they reside in large numbers. How will this amendment affect such States? Let us take it as applied to a few of the States of this Union.

Take the State of Maine. According to the census of 1860, Maine had 167,724 white males over the age of twenty-one years. How many black males had she over that age? Only 262. So, then, it does not at all affect the power and influence of that State on this floor.

But look at Maryland. By the census of 1860 she had a population of 123,371 white male citizens of the age of twenty-one, and at the same time she had a population of 38,030 black males over that age. This proposition, therefore, strikes from the number of Representatives of the State of Maryland one fourth of her representation on this floor; and takes away at least one of her members.

Take the State of South Carolina. It is well known that her black population are in the majority. By the census of 1860 she had 68,154 white males over the age of twenty-one, and 92,923 blacks over that age. More than one half of the representation of that State will therefore be excluded.

Mississippi is in the same condition. That State by the same census contained 84,338 white males over twenty-one years of age, and 98,510 blacks. So she will lose in the same proportion.

New Hampshire had in 1860 a white male population over the age of twenty-one years of 91,944. How many black males do you suppose she had over that age? Only 149.

The disinterested gentleman from such States are for changing the basis of representation, so that it shall increase relatively their power here. They propose, while they believe they have the power to do so, to make this great change deeply affecting the rights and interests of States which are denied all right to discuss and vote on such a grave proposition in either House of Congress, and thus reduce by at least twenty-five the number of members to which the States to be affected by this amendment are now by the Constitution and laws of the United States entitled.

But I cannot dwell upon this second section. Considering the fact that eleven States are now denied all representation here, it is an effort outside of constitutional power to change this Government. What did the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOTTWELL] declare one month ago on this floor in reference to this question. He used this language:

"Well, sir, I am for a Union, and for that Union only in which there is substantial justice among the men and between the States composing it."

Not the Union, not the old Union, of which that old flag [pointing to the flag over the Speaker's chair] is emblematic; no, sir, but for "a Union." He further said:

"I accept one fact, and no gentleman can escape the force of that fact, and that is, that these eleven States are not to-day represented in the Congress of this country, and with my consent they never shall be until this inequality is adjusted or its adjustment provided for."

That is the proposition, that these eleven States are not to be represented until the inequality of representation, of which gentlemen now complain, shall be provided for. Provided for, how and by whom? By the remaining twenty-five States through two thirds of their representatives upon the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives. Sir, there is no warrant for such a thing in the Constitution.

But I cannot dwell upon this proposition in the limited time that is allowed me. There is another section in this amendment to which I will now refer. There was a celebrated third section in the proposition which passed this House a month ago. If I understood the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] correctly this morning, he said he was going to vote for the amendments made by the Senate and now pending before this House. I ask the Clerk to read what the gentleman said a month ago on this same question. On the day the final vote was taken in this House on the amendments reported by the joint committee of fifteen the gentleman from Pennsylvania rallied his friends to the support of that celebrated third section. "The third section or nothing," was his cry. I will ask the Clerk to read what the gentleman said on that occasion.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. STEVENS. I should be sorry to find that that provision was stricken out, because before any portion of this can be put into operation there will be, if not a Herod, a worse than Herod elsewhere to obstruct our actions. That side of the House will be filled with yelling secessionists and hissing copperheads. Give us the third section or give us nothing. Do not mock us with the pretense of an amendment which throws the Union into the hands of the enemy before it becomes consolidated."

"Gentlemen say I speak of party. Whenever party is necessary to sustain the Union I say rally to your party and save the Union. I do not hesitate to say at once, that section is there to save or destroy the Union party, is there to save or destroy the Union by the salvation or destruction of the Union party."

Mr. FINCK. Thus, according to the declaration of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, the party which he represents is already destroyed, because he says "that section is there to save or destroy the Union party." It was there for the safety or destruction of the party he so ably represents. But that third section is there no longer. It has perished in the house of its friends, and according to the logic of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the party he represents is destroyed. Peace to its ashes!

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Amen to its destruction!

Mr. FINCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, what have we got in the place of the old third section? We have a proposition which no intelligent man in this country believes will ever be ratified by three fourths of the States. I ask the Clerk to read the third section.

The Clerk read as follows:

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two thirds of each House remove such disability.

Mr. FINCK. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, whose favorite third section has been killed, proposes to accept in its stead the section just read, which does not deprive the people of the States lately in rebellion of the right to vote, but of the right to hold office. Well, it is very sweeping in its operation. What does it propose? Not only that members of Congress, Cabinet ministers, and judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, who voluntarily went into the rebellion, but that every man who has exercised judicial or legislative functions under the Federal Government or under the States themselves, who went into the rebellion giving it aid and comfort, shall forever be excluded from holding office, not only under the Federal Government, but under the State governments.

That, sir, is a sweeping clause. Everybody knows that thousands and hundreds of thousands of the people of these States who went into the rebellion and gave it aid and comfort did so involuntarily. They were compelled to do so. Many of them were drafted. You do not except these men from the operation of this provision, but they are placed side by side with Davis, Breckinridge, Toombs, Slidell, and Mason, and are by this section excluded from holding any office, civil or military, either under the Federal or State governments. I say it is an outrage upon the people of those States who were compelled to give their aid and assistance in the rebellion.

Now, sir, every man knows that from the very moment the jurisdiction of the United States had been successfully resisted and ousted, so that it had no longer power to protect the people within the limits of the so-called confederate power, these people were allowed by the laws of nations to yield obedience to that power which for the time being controlled them, and gave them protection. That doctrine has been established in Great Britain for many generations, and has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States.

You propose to do what you have no right to do by law; you propose to make an ex post facto law by an amendment to the Constitution. You propose to inflict upon these people a punishment not known to the law in existence at the time any offense may have been committed, but after the offense has been committed; you propose a punishment which the Constitution and laws of the United States do not now provide. You propose to disfranchise men who have applied for in good faith and received pardons from the President.

Now what is the effect of a pardon? It is to make the man pardoned a new man; not merely as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] would have it, to remove the punishment prescribed by law, but to remove all forfeitures and penalties. Such is the weight of authority of all the decisions of the courts without any exception.

And on this point, I will refer to some authorities, which I quoted on a former occasion in this House. Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of the United States vs. Wilson, 7 Peters, 162, speaking on this subject of pardons in England, said:

"As the power has been exercised from time immemorial by the Executive of that nation whose language is our language, and to whose judicial institutions ours bear a close resemblance, we adopt their principles respecting the operation and effect of a pardon, and look into their books for the rules prescribing the manner in which it is to be used by the person who would avail himself of it."

In 7 Bacon's Abridgment, page 416, it is said:

"It was formerly doubted whether a pardon could do more than take away the punishment, leaving the crime and its disabling consequences unremoved. But it is now settled that a pardon, whether by the king or by act of Parliament, removes not only the punishment but all the legal disabilities consequent on the crime."

The doctrine is thus stated in 1 Bishop on Criminal Law, 713:

"The effect of a full pardon is to absolve the party from all the legal consequences of his crime, and of his conviction direct and collateral, including the punishment whether of imprisonment, pecuniary penalty, or whatever else the law provided."

Also, in 5 Bacon's Abridgment it is laid down:

"It seems agreed that a pardon of treason or felony, even after an attainder, so far clears the party from the infamy, and all other consequences thereof, that he may have an action against any who shall afterward call him a traitor or felon, for the pardon makes him, as it were, a new man."

Blackstone says:

"A pardon may be pleaded in bar as at once destroying the end and purpose of the indictment, by remitting the punishment which the prosecution is calculated to inflict."

Also:

"The effect of such a pardon by the king is to make the offender a new man; to acquit him of all corporeal punishment and forfeitures annexed to that offense, for which he obtains his pardon."

Sir, the time has come for the exercise of the spirit of forgiveness, conciliation, and kindness, in order to restore fraternal relations between the sections. Mr. Speaker, I am not only opposed to this third section, but I am at this time, in the present condition of the country, opposed to all amendments to the Constitution.

But the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania is afraid that power may pass from the hands of his party, and that Democrats may again be in the majority on this floor.

Sir, I believe the time will soon come when the power shall have passed from the radicals who have abused it, and this Government be once more administered by that glorious old party which administered it so long and so wisely, and under which this nation advanced in greatness and glory without a parallel in history. Gentlemen are accustomed to speak in terms of derision of the Democratic party. Sir, it will survive their assaults. Yes, survive to take charge of and administer this Government again. To heal the wounds which have been inflicted upon the country; to bind closer the bonds of the Union; to gather once more around the common altar of the country, in friendship and patriotic devotion, the Representatives of all the States. Gentleman would do well not to forget that the Democrats of these twenty-five States, in 1864, polled eighteen hundred thousand votes. And they should not forget that to-day, perhaps, these eighteen hundred thousand men have, by accessions of conservative men, swelled into an actual majority of the voters of these twenty-five States.

But, Mr. Speaker, whatever their numbers may be, they are men who have as much interest in the honor, the glory, and prosperity of this country as any other equal number of men within the limits of the Republic. They are to-day, as they have always been, devoted to the Union of these States; and, by the blessing of Heaven, they are determined to maintain that Union, and the Constitution which preserves it, against the assaults of all, whether they come from the North or the South.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I shall ever consider it the crowning honor of my life that I was permitted, as a humble member of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, to record my vote in favor of that amendment to the Constitution of the United States which has made our whole country, the United States of America, emphatically "the land of the free" as it is confessedly "the home of the brave." And I hope that I may be permitted this day to give one other vote which shall be among the richest legacies I can transmit to my children.

Sir, on the 5th day of January last it fell to my lot to address this House in Committee of the Whole. At the close of my remarks on that occasion, I ventured to state a number of propositions which I supposed would satisfy my constituency in this business of reconstruction. Among those propositions was one to "amend the Constitution of the United States in respect to apportionment of Representatives and direct taxes among the several States of the Union, in such manner that 'people of color' shall not be counted with the population making up the ratio, except it be in States where they are permitted to exercise the elective franchise." Among the provisions of the amendment to the Constitution now reported by the committee I find one substantially covering the same ground. I say, as an individual, that I would more cheerfully give my vote if that provision allowed all men of proper age whom we have made free to join in the exercise of the right of suffrage in this country. But if I cannot obtain all that I wish, I will go heartily to secure all we can obtain.

Again, sir, I said, "Insert a provision in the Constitution prohibiting the repudiation of the national debt, and also prohibiting the assumption by Congress of the rebel debt." That is also incorporated among the provisions reported from the committee and acted upon by the Senate.

I also said, "Provide in the Constitution that no person who has at any time taken up arms against the United States shall ever be admitted to a seat in the Senate or House of Representatives of Congress." The joint committee and the Senate have adopted a provision which is better by far than the one I proposed; I shall most cordially vote in favor of it.

I have been told that perhaps the close of the third section might be open to misapprehension and misconstruction. I desire very briefly to give my view of that question, as one given to the construing of laws and constitutions by practice and education. The last clause of that section is as follows:

But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Now, it has been claimed by some that this would put it into the power of two thirds of each branch of Congress to annul this amendment of the Constitution after it shall have been adopted. I say that such never could be the construction put upon this provision by any court under the light of the sun. The section reads:

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid and comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

Remove what disability? The personal disability in each individual case, and not to remove the provision of the Constitution itself, which is to stand for all time.

I am satisfied to take this proposed amendment as it is. I take it from the first word of the joint resolution to the last syllable of the proposed amendment; and I give to the whole a hearty "amen," and I trust that the vote this day will show that all the Union members of this House here present are actuated by the same sentiments which now inspire my bosom.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in the very limited time allowed me on this occasion I propose to call the attention of the House more particularly to the fourth section of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States. That section begins with the enunciation of a very sound and wholesome principle. It declares that "the validity of the public debt, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned."

Possibly it might have been better never to have mentioned this question at all. The sacred character of the public debt ought never to be called in question. It would have been well if no man had anticipated that the time could ever arrive when the United States would repudiate its public debt. While, therefore, I give my hearty sanction to that proposition I desire specially to call the attention of the House to the remaining clause of the same section. The first clause is ample, but the last member of the section operates in the nature of a proviso, limiting and restraining the preceding language, and amounting to direct and open repudiation. The clause upon which I base this assertion is the following:

But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave, but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

Now, sir, this is an open repudiation of a solemn statute of this Congress. I ask the Clerk to read a portion of the twenty-fourth section of an act approved February 24, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act for enrolling and calling out the national forces."

The Clerk read as follows:

"That all able-bodied male colored persons between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form a part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States, his master shall have a certificate thereof, and thereupon such slave shall be free; and the bounty of $100, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person was owing service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States. The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $500 for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the fund derived from commutations; and every such colored volunteer, on being mustered into the service, shall be free. And in all cases where men of color have been heretofore enlisted, or have volunteered in the military service of the United States, all the provisions of this act, so far as the pay of the bounty and compensation are provided, shall be equally applicable as to those who may be hereafter recruited."

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. It will be observed that this proposed constitutional amendment provides that "all debts, obligations, and claims" "for the loss or emancipation of any slaves" "shall be held illegal and void." But the provision of the act of 1864, which has just been read, provides in so many words that a loyal man whose slave may have been drafted shall receive a bounty of $100; that at the time such slave is drafted the master shall receive a certificate, upon which he shall draw the money. The next clause provides that the owner of a slave volunteering in the military service of the United States—for at that period of the war it was of great importance to encourage volunteering—shall receive compensation not exceeding $300.

I care but little about this question except for the principle involved. We in Kentucky have suffered losses and are prepared to suffer losses. But I present this question as a question of good faith. The Government has given this pledge to the owners of slaves who volunteered or were drafted into the Army of the United States; and it is now proposed that this pledge shall be disregarded and set at naught.

Gentlemen may say that this principle of making compensation for slaves is all wrong; but, sir, the law itself declares that it is a "just compensation." The language of the act is:

"The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300 for each such colored volunteer."

And then the act goes on and designates the very fund out of which this compensation shall be paid—the fund derived from commutations.

Here, then, is a vested right acquired under a law passed by this Congress to encourage volunteering and to recruit the national forces. By this act the faith of the nation is pledged that every loyal owner whose slave may have volunteered or been drafted into the military service of the United States shall receive what Congress then termed a "just compensation not exceeding $300." Yet by the constitutional amendment now before us it is proposed to repudiate this solemn pledge of the nation's faith.

Now, sir, it is well to be a little cautious on this subject of repudiation. We make no threats on our part. We denounced the sentiment and the very idea of repudiation, but here this very article which proposes to declare that the public debt shall be held inviolably sacred contains a clause which in direct and open terms proposes an utter repudiation of that very law which provided for nothing but "just compensation."

Under the section to which I have referred commissioners were appointed in Maryland and Delaware, and progressed to some extent with their work; but in Missouri and Kentucky no commissioners have yet been appointed. It is now proposed that this public debt—a debt of record, acknowledged to be just and valid—shall be repudiated. Do you suppose, sir, that good faith can be thus violated, and those who commit this violation escape in the future all consequences of their act? If you stir up a hornet's nest like this, may you not be stung by and by? The act which this Congress proposes to do is palpably unjust, Congress itself being the judge, and this proposed amendment being the test.

There is no evasion. It is an open and direct attempt at repudiation. I ask, sir, whether there is any man from Missouri, Maryland, Delaware, or Kentucky who will stultify himself by going for this amendment when it repudiates a recognized debt on the part of these States. Dare you set an example of repudiation? If you do can you ever complain, should it become the mad cry throughout the country? If you give the example can you complain when it comes to be followed? The people will say, when repudiation takes place, they are only following your own example. Do you suppose in the West, do you suppose in Missouri, Delaware, Maryland, and Kentucky, with all the burdens they have had to bear during the war, they are going to be tributary to the northern and eastern States? Do you suppose they will continue to pay the heavy share imposed upon them for the public debt when they are denied a small compensation like this?

But as my time is limited, I will not dwell further on that point. I warn gentlemen to pause before they set such an example. You are in power now, triumphantly so, but your actions since you have been here seem to show you are not satisfied that you are going to continue in power. Set an example like this, and can you complain of repudiation afterward?

In regard to this constitutional amendment a great many things might be said. It is provided in the first section that all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

And the last section provides that Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article. This at once transfers all powers from the State governments over the citizens of a State to Congress. You will see that it is only a preparation for an interminable conflict between the Federal and State jurisdictions. We know what the result of this will be, for we have already seen it tested. Will not Congress then virtually hold all power of legislation over your own citizens and in defiance of you?

But how does this agree with the memorable language of the Chicago platform, which declares in so many words that "the right of each State to order and control its own domestic affairs according to its own judgment exclusively is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend?" This amendment is in direct contravention of that platform, because it transfers to Congress from the States all power of control over their own citizens. Let me tell you, you are preparing for revolutions after revolutions. They may be peaceful, and I hope they will. I warn you there will be no peace in this country until each State be allowed to control its own citizens. If you take that from them what care I for the splendid machinery of a national Government? My constituents are able to judge of their own wants, but you propose to take this power from them and to transfer it to Congress, and to let Congress judge of their wants and what legislation should be enacted for their government.

I think I should be sustained by high authority if I were to announce that this amendment is a mere political platform, and that it is not approved by many who will vote for it, because they do not believe it ought to pass. It is a mere platform upon which the party is to go before the country to fight the political battles of next fall. I should have high authority if I were to say that those who vote for these constitutional amendments were opposed to them, and that they are about to go before the country with them masked and veiled in hypocrisy and deceit. We have heard from the gentleman just now, in regard to the third section, that the heart and core of the whole matter is gone.

But further than that. The Senator [Mr. SHERMAN] who was referred to by the gentleman who first addressed you to-day, set out in his speech by saying:

"I shall detain the Senate but for a moment to explain the reasons for the vote I shall give in opposition to what is my own deliberate judgment on the question now pending."

"This proposition is simple, plain, and obvious; and yet under the necessity in which we are now placed, I shall feel called upon to vote against it."

And then, after making further comments, he uses this language in regard to the amendment which he is going to vote against:

"That is a plain and obvious principle, and if that principle was adopted, the southern States would feel no local jealousy. They could not feel any."

"Although my opinion is as clear as it can be upon any subject that this amendment is right in itself, both branches of it, yet as we were compelled to unite on some measure—and we must all yield some of our opinions upon various questions involved—there are five sections in this proposed article—I feel bound to vote against this amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, though in my judgment it would do more than any other to heal the difficulties by which we are surrounded."

There is an open confession that he is about to vote against an amendment which he entertains no doubt would do more to heal our difficulties than anything else!

Now, sir, no man can excuse himself for a thing of that kind; and while I admire the honesty of his confession, that he is doing it for party and political purposes, yet I utterly detest the odious principle that he avows for mere party purposes.

I ask the attention of the House to an extract from another speech, and, mark you, I am not now offering you "copperhead" testimony. The extract is from a speech made by one of your great northern lights, the celebrated Wendell Phillips. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. Phillips hoped the Senate's amendment of the reconstruction plan would meet with an ignominious defeat, and that Massachusetts would reject it. He would welcome every Democrat and copperhead vote to help its defeat. He would go a step further and said, I hope that the Republican party, if it goes to the polls next fall on this basis, will be defeated. If this is the only thing that the party has to offer, it deserves defeat. The Republican party to-day seeks only to save its life. God grant that it may lose it!"

"The Republicans go to the people in deceit and hypocrisy, with their faces masked and their convictions hid; I hope to God they will be defeated! I want another sordid, not only to uncover the hidden sentiments of a Cabinet, but to smoke out the United States Senate, that we may see how many of them range by the side of Sumner, Ben. Wade, Judge Kelley, and Thad. Stevens."

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Ay, sir, some of the men named there have since given way and fallen, and are no longer on Phillips's loyal list. As I said, sir, I am not reading southern testimony, or the testimony of copperheads; but from this great northern light, the man who has done more for the Republican party than any other man in the country. He was raised among them; he has affiliated with them; and he cannot be deceived as to their purposes. He charges that this Republican party is going before the country wearing a mask of hypocrisy, with its visage masked, and that its object is not to amend the Constitution, but, as Senator SUMNER says, to save the life of the Republican party; and he says, "God grant they may lose it!" Now, sir, I cannot call in question such authority as this. He must know what he is talking about, and I have had read to you what he says.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS. I now, sir, move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

ENROLLED BILL AND RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 328) for the relief of Mrs. Abigail Ryan, and joint resolution (S. R. No. 51) respecting bounties to colored soldiers, and the pensions, bounties, and allowances to their heirs; when the Speaker signed the same.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House long. A few words will suffice.

We may, perhaps, congratulate the House and the country on the near approach to completion of a proposition to be submitted to the people for the admission of an outlawed community into the privileges and advantages of a civilized and free Government.

When I say that we should rejoice at such completion, I do not thereby intend so much to express joy at the superior excellence of the scheme, as that there is to be a scheme—a scheme containing much positive good, as well, I am bound to admit, as the omission of many better things.

In my youth, in my manhood, in my old age, I had fondly dreamed that when any fortunate chance should have broken up for awhile the foundation of our institutions, and released us from obligations the most tyrannical that ever man imposed in the name of freedom, that the intelligent, pure and just men of this Republic, true to their professions and their consciences, would have so remodeled all our institutions as to have freed them from every vestige of human oppression, of inequality of rights, of the recognized degradation of the poor, and the superior caste of the rich. In short, that no distinction would be tolerated in this purified Republic but what arose from merit and conduct. This bright dream has vanished "like the baseless fabric of a vision." I find that we shall be obliged to be content with patching up the worst portions of the ancient edifice, and leaving it, in many of its parts, to be swept through by the tempests, the frosts, and the storms of despotism.

Do you inquire why, holding these views and possessing some will of my own, I accept so imperfect a proposition? I answer, because I live among men and not among angels; among men as intelligent, as determined, and as independent as myself, who, not agreeing with me, do not choose to yield their opinions to mine. Mutual concession, therefore, is our only resort, or mutual hostilities.

We might well have been justified in making renewed and more strenuous efforts for a better plan could we have had the cooperation of the Executive. With his cordial assistance the rebel States might have been made model republics, and this nation an empire of universal freedom. But he preferred "restoration" to "reconstruction." He chooses that the slave States should remain as nearly as possible in their ancient condition, with such small modifications as he and his prime minister should suggest, without any impertinent interference from Congress. He anticipated the legitimate action of the national Legislature, and by rank usurpation erected governments in the conquered provinces; imposed upon them institutions in the most arbitrary and unconstitutional manner; and now maintains them as legitimate governments, and insolently demands that they shall be represented in Congress on equal terms with loyal and regular States.

To repress this tyranny and at the same time to do some justice to conquered rebels requires caution. The great danger is that the seceders may soon overwhelm the loyal men in Congress. The haste urged upon us by some loyal but impetuous men; their anxiety to embrace the representatives of rebels; their ambition to display their dexterity in the use of the broad mantle of charity; and especially the danger arising from the unscrupulous use of patronage and from the oily orations of false prophets, famous for sixty-day obligations and for protested political promises, admonish us to make no further delay.

A few words will suffice to explain the changes made by the Senate in the proposition which we sent them.

The first section is altered by defining who are citizens of the United States and of the States. This is an excellent amendment, long needed to settle conflicting decisions between the several States and the United States. It declares this great privilege to belong to every person born or naturalized in the United States.

The second section has received but slight alteration. I wish it had received more. It contains much less power than I could wish; it has not half the vigor of the amendment which was lost in the Senate. It or the proposition offered by Senator WADE would have worked the enfranchisement of the colored man in half the time.

The third section has been wholly changed by substituting the ineligibility of certain high offenders for the disfranchisement of all rebels until 1870.

This I cannot look upon as an improvement. It opens the elective franchise to such as the States choose to admit. In my judgment it endangers the Government of the country, both State and national; and may give the next Congress and President to the reconstructed rebels. With their enlarged basis of representation, and exclusion of the loyal men of color from the ballot-box, I see no hope of safety unless in the prescription of proper enabling acts, which shall do justice to the freedmen and enjoin enfranchisement as a condition precedent.

The fourth section, which renders inviolable the public debt and repudiates the rebel debt, will secure the approbation of all but traitors.

The fifth section is unaltered.

You perceive that while I see much good in the proposition I do not pretend to be satisfied with it. And yet I am anxious for its speedy adoption, for I dread delay. The danger is that before any constitutional guards shall have been adopted Congress will be flooded by rebels and rebel sympathizers. Whoever has mingled much in deliberative bodies must have observed the mental as well as physical nervousness of many members, impelling them too often to injudicious action. Whoever has watched the feelings of this House during the tedious months of this session, listened to the impatient whispering of some and the open declarations of others; especially when able and sincere men propose to gratify personal predilections by breaking the ranks of the Union forces and presenting to the enemy a ragged front of stragglers, must be anxious to hasten the result and prevent the demoralization of our friends. Hence, I say, let us no longer delay; take what we can get now, and hope for better things in further legislation; in enabling acts or other provisions.

I now, sir, ask for the question.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is on concurring in the amendments of the Senate; and as it requires by the Constitution a two-thirds vote, the vote will be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. DEFREES. I ask the consent of the House to print some remarks upon this question, which I have not had an opportunity of delivering.

No objection was made, and leave was granted. [The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the same privilege.

No objection was made, and leave was granted. [The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

The joint resolution as amended by the Senate is as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —.

SEC. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

The question was put on concurring with the amendments of the Senate; and there were—yeas 120, nays 82, not voting 82; as follows:

The SPEAKER. Two thirds of both Houses having concurred in the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the joint resolution has passed.

During the roll-call on the foregoing vote, Mr. KELLEY said: I desire to announce that Mr. BROOMALL, and Mr. WASHBURN of Illinois, are paired with Mr. SHANKLIN upon this question.

Mr. LAFLIN said: I wish to announce that my colleague, Mr. VAN HORN, is paired upon this question with Mr. GOODYEAR.

Mr. SCHENCK. And I desire to say that if Jeff. Davis were here, he would probably also have voted the same way. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WENTWORTH. And so would Jake Thompson.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House is now engaged in executing the order of the House to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 492, making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under authority of law, and for other purposes.

Mr. ELIOT. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION LAW.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 477, further to provide for the safety of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, to regulate the salaries of steamboat inspectors, and for other purposes.

Mr. ELIOT. I move that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

EXAMINERS OF PATENTS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 350, to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to pay those employed as examiners and assistant examiners the salary fixed by law for the duties performed by them; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask that this bill be put upon its passage now.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Let the bill be read. I want to know what it is.

The bill was read at length. It authorizes the Commissioner of Patents to pay those employed in the Patent Office from April 1, 1861, until August 1, 1865, as examiners and assistant examiners of patents, at the rate fixed by law for those respective grades, provided that the same be paid out of the Patent Office fund, the compensation thus to be paid not to exceed that paid to those duly enrolled as examiners and assistant examiners for the same period.

Mr. JENCKES. This matter has been considered by the House Committee on Patents, who have recommended it once during the last Congress and once during the present Congress. I call the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I suggest that this bill better be referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand that the Committee on Patents of this House have examined this bill and decided to report unanimously in its favor.

Mr. ROSS. Is a motion to refer the bill now in order?

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order, pending the motion to lay upon the table and the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] withdraw the motion to allow the Chair to lay before the House several executive communications?

Mr. STEVENS. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

DIRECT TAXES IN GEORGIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I communicate, and invite the attention of Congress to, a copy of joint resolutions of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, requesting the suspension of the collection of the internal revenue tax due from that State pursuant to an act of Congress of 5th of August, 1861.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1866.

The message, with accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE—GEORGIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It is proper that I should inform Congress that a copy of an act of the Legislature of Georgia of the 10th of March last has been officially communicated to me, by which that State accepts the donation of land for the benefit of colleges for agriculture and the mechanic arts, which donation was provided for by the acts of Congress of 2d July and 14th April, 1864.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1866.

The message was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

DRAFT IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 11th instant, in regard to the draft in the eighth congressional district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that this communication be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

BRITISH AMERICAN TRADE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of March 28, 1866, calling for information in regard to commercial relations with British America.

The question was upon ordering the communication to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS. Can an objection be made at this time to the printing of this communication?

The SPEAKER. It is customary to order the printing of all executive communications without putting the question to the House, unless objections be made to the printing.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the printing of this communication.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the question of printing will be submitted to the House.

Mr. DAVIS. Before the question is taken I desire to say a single word upon it. If I understand this communication—

Mr. WENTWORTH. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is whether the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to commercial relations with British America shall be printed.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Before that question is voted upon, or even debated, I insist that the communication shall be read. I object to one member of the House knowing the contents of a report while the other members know nothing about it. The gentleman from New York says that he rises to debate this report. If he proposes to debate it, he of course knows what is in it; and I think I ought to know as much as he does. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. For the purpose of giving gentlemen an opportunity to know what is in the report, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment, that I may offer an explanation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want an opportunity to read this report, and I therefore insist on my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of Mrs. Lavinia Lenfest, and 70 others, of Union, Maine, asking for a pension.

By Mr. ALLEY: The petition of J. B. Alley, and others, for the relief of Lewis A. Horton, an invalid soldier.

By Mr. DARLING: The petition of A. D. Bishop, for relief.

By Mr. MERCUR: The petition of L. D. Page, asking that a pension be granted to Eunice Satterlee, of Bradford county, Pennsylvania, a survivor of the Wyoming massacre.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The memorial of Quincy A. May, of Spencer county, Indiana, late a soldier of company H, eighty-third regiment Illinois volunteers, praying for a pension.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 14, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. CONNESS. If there be no objection, I move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

No objection being made, the further reading is dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York in favor of a bankrupt law. They say "that in the judgment of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York it is very important that the present Congress of the United States should enact a law to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy; and that the act for that purpose recently passed by the House of Representatives meets the cordial approval of this Chamber." The measure to which this memorial refers is the bill introduced into the House of Representatives by Hon. Mr. JENCKES, of Rhode Island. It has passed that body and is now in the hands of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. While it is not usual to speak of any measure until it is reported, much less to anticipate the action of any committee of this body, I nevertheless hope I shall be excused in at least expressing the hope that the committee will report that bill sufficiently early to receive the consideration of the Senate at the present session.

Mr. President, I am at the present time, and have been for a long time, in favor of a national bankrupt law. I am not only in favor of a national bankrupt law, but I am in favor of the bill which has passed the House of Representatives. I am in favor both of the voluntary and involuntary features of the bill. I believe that if we wait for a better we may, and probably shall, get a worse one. While it has been the high privilege of the people of the United States, acting through their constituted authorities, to unfetter four million human beings held in involuntary servitude or labor on a portion of our soil, I trust it will not be considered any less our duty to relieve from pecuniary bondage a class of men who have committed no crime, against whom there is no charge except the charge of having been unfortunate in business and unable to meet their legal obligations. I move that the memorial be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON presented additional papers in the case of Mrs. A. M. Roblas y Robaldo in support of her claim for quartermaster's stores destroyed during the Mexican war; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

RAILROADS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. HOWE. I move to take up for consideration Senate joint resolution No. 85.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. HOWE. I wish for personal reasons that the Senate would allow this resolution to be taken up.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not object, if we can get in our reports.

Mr. HOWE. I desire very much to have this resolution taken up and disposed of. It will lead to no debate. It simply construes a former act of Congress.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 85) explanatory of and in addition to the act of May 5, 1864, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in Wisconsin," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the words "in a northwestern direction," in the third section of the act granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin, approved May 5, 1864, shall, without forfeiture to that State, or its assigns, of any rights or benefits under that act, or exemption from any of the conditions or obligations imposed by it, be construed to authorize the location of the line of road provided for in that section, along and upon the following route: from the city of Portage, by the way of the city of Ripon, in the county of Fond du Lac, and the city of Berlin, in the county of Green Lake, to Stevens's Point, and thence to Bayfield, and thence to Superior, on Lake Superior. The Legislature of Wisconsin having authorized and required the Portage and Superior Railroad Company to construct the line of road in that section provided for, upon and along the route thus set forth and described, the Congress of the United States, by this resolution, gives its assent to that route, and consents to the selection and application of the lands granted to the State of Wisconsin by the third section of the act of Congress of May 5, 1864, for and to the line of railroad thus defined and described, in the same manner and with the same effect as if it was located and constructed in strict conformity with and upon the route prescribed in that section of that act of Congress.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET A. FARRAN.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Margaret A. Farran, praying for a pension, to report a bill for her relief, and I ask that the bill be put on its passage this morning. The granting of the pension in this case has been delayed for two years by mere technicalities.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 368) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret A. Farran was read three times and passed. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Margaret A. Farran, widow of Abraham Farran, late a private in the twenty-fourth battery Indiana light artillery, on the pension-roll, at the rate of eight dollars a month, to commence February 16, 1864, and continue during her widowhood.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (H.

R. No. 556) to authorize the issuing of a military land-warrant to Frederick Berlin, assignee of the heirs of Peter Hess, deceased, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 351) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease such of the public lands of the United States as are known as saline lands, or lands containing mineral springs, and to provide for the preservation and development of the same, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 369) to establish certain post roads; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the memorial of Philip Fraser, United States district judge for the northern district of Florida, praying for an increase of compensation; a petition of members of the bar of Kansas, praying for an increase of the salary of the United States district judge for that district; a petition of members of the bar of Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania; and a large number of petitions and memorials on the general subject of increasing the salaries of district judges, having reported a bill covering the subject of all these petitions, ask to be discharged from their further consideration.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Philip Lansdale, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay of passed assistant surgeon and that of surgeon while acting as surgeon from the 25th of April, 1859, to the 25th of February, 1861, reported a bill (S. No. 370) for the relief of Philip Lansdale, surgeon United States Navy; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

NAVY PAY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 360) in amendment of an act to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment and to recommend its passage. This bill is in explanation of an act that passed about a month ago, the construction of which involves some embarrassment to the Department. And as it is unanimously reported by the committee, and can lead to no debate, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and insert the following as a substitute:

That the appointments to be made under the act entitled "An act to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy," approved May 3, 1866, may be made from the number of acting assistant paymasters of the Navy who performed duty as acting assistant paymasters during the war, and who at the time of their appointment under this act shall not be over the age of thirty-two years.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to waive the examination of such officers in the pay department of the Navy as are on duty abroad and cannot at present be examined as required by law: Provided, That such examinations as are required by law shall be made as soon as practicable after the return of said officers to the United States; and no officer found to be disqualified shall receive the promotion contemplated in the act therein referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time and passed. Its title was amended so as to read, "A bill to regulate the appointment of paymasters in the Navy, and explanatory of an act for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RIDDLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 371) to incorporate the Metropolitan Hall and Market Company of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 372) supplemental to an act entitled "An act relating to the admission of patients to the Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia," approved January 28, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That Friday, the 15th instant, be assigned for the consideration of the bills on the Calendar relating to the District of Columbia.

NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Senate bill No. 269.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 269) to define the number and regulate the appointment of officers in the Navy. It provides that the number allowed in each grade of line officers on the active list of the Navy shall be one vice admiral, eleven rear admirals, twenty-five commodores, fifty captains, ninety commanders, one hundred and eighty lieutenant commanders, one hundred and eighty lieutenants, one hundred and sixty masters, one hundred and sixty ensigns, and in other grades the number now allowed by law; but the increase in the grades below that of rear admiral and above that of lieutenant, authorized by this act, are to be made by selection of officers who have rendered the most efficient and faithful service during the recent war; and vacancies in the grade above commodore on the active and retired lists are to be filled by selection from the grade next below, and the number of rear admirals, including all on the active and retired lists, is not to exceed twenty-one.

*Of the number of line officers of the Navy on the active list, five lieutenant commanders, twenty lieutenants, fifty masters, and seventy-five ensigns may be appointed from those officers who have served in the volunteer naval service for a period of not less than two years, and who are either now in that service or have been honorably discharged therefrom; but if by reason of these appointments the number of officers in any grade shall exceed the number fixed by law, no more promotions or appointments to that grade are to be made until the number is reduced below the number fixed by law for that grade; and the authority given by this section is to be exhausted when the number of volunteer officers named shall have been once appointed.

The Secretary of the Navy is to appoint a board consisting of not less than three naval officers superior in rank to the officers to be thus appointed in the regular Navy from the volunteer service, which board, after examination of the claims of all candidates, is to select and report to the Secretary of the Navy, as the most meritorious in character, ability, and honorable service, twice the number to be transferred to the several grades mentioned in the third section of this act, from whom he is to select the persons to be appointed to each of those grades. Any officer who has served in the volunteer naval service for the term of two years or more is to have the right to appear before the examining board and present his claims and be examined for an appointment in the regular Navy.

The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to retain or to appoint, under existing laws and regulations, such volunteer officers in the Navy as the exigencies of the service may require, until their places can be supplied by graduates from the Naval Academy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Naval Affairs have reported several amendments to the bill, which will be read and considered in their order.

Mr. GRIMES. Before these amendments are acted upon I desire to explain the provisions of this bill to the Senate; and I trust I shall have the attention of the Senate, because it is a bill of considerable importance, and establishes a new principle that has not heretofore been recognized or acted upon in the Navy of the United States.

It will be observed that this bill proposes to increase the number of line officers of the Navy. The number now authorized by law is one vice admiral, nine rear admirals, eighteen commodores, thirty-six captains, seventy-two commanders, one hundred and forty-four lieutenant commanders, one hundred and forty-four lieutenants, one hundred and forty-four masters, and one hundred and forty-four ensigns. This bill, as amended by the committee, proposes to create one admiral, one vice admiral, ten rear admirals, twenty-five commodores, fifty captains, ninety commanders, one hundred and eighty lieutenant commanders, one hundred and sixty commanders, and one hundred and sixty ensigns. Gentlemen who have the Register before them, by a reference to it will observe that here is an increase of one hundred and forty-five officers. The number now embraced in these various grades is seven hundred and twelve. The number, if this bill should pass and become a law, that would constitute the Navy would be eight hundred and fifty-seven. The committee had their attention called to this subject by the Secretary of the Navy in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, dated the 16th of April, 1866, inclosing in his letter the bill now under consideration, in which he says:

"The first of these proposed substitutes increases the number of line officers, but not to the extent of the number of volunteers which the bill adds to the regular service by the second section; that section adds one hundred and fifty officers, but the substitute provides that the enumerated grades shall amount to no more than eight hundred and fifty-seven officers, which is an increase of only one hundred and forty-five. The number in those grades allowed by existing laws is seven hundred and twelve. These numbers are hardly sufficient for the exigencies of the public service on a peace establishment, and for this reason provision is made in the fourth section of the bill which passed the House for retaining the volunteers which may be needed until their places can be supplied by graduates from the Academy.

"The next feature of the proposed first section requires that this increase of officers in the grades below rear admiral and above lieutenant shall be made by selection from those officers who have rendered the most efficient and faithful service during the war."

And it is to this new provision that I desire to call the attention of the Senate. Heretofore, since the time of Decatur, who was promoted over the heads of other officers for his distinguished merit, all promotions, with the exception of six, I believe, have been made by regular gradation. It is proposed in this instance that this increase in the grades shall be made from the grade next below of those persons who have most distinguished themselves during the war. Captain Worden, Commodore Rodgers, Lieutenant Cushing, Commodore Rowan, Admiral Porter, perhaps one or two more, I think six was the whole number, were promoted over the heads of persons who stood before them during the war for distinguished merit. This proposes to authorize a few persons—I do not know the exact number—to be promoted over the heads of those who have not thus distinguished themselves; and this is the new principle to which I call the attention of the Senate. The Secretary says further:

"The law authorizing the advancement of officers for conspicuous conduct in battle has been carried into effect by the promotion of such heroes as Farragut, Rodgers, Rowan, Worden, Winslow, and Cushing. The wisdom of the law which has carried forward those officers for distinguished service beyond their original position and rank I have never heard controverted.

"There are, however, many efficient and excellent officers in the Navy that have done good service during the rebellion who cannot be legally reached in consequence of the stringent terms of that law. It is important, indeed, that the exercise of the power of selection should be carefully guarded, and that selections should be judiciously and carefully made. Under almost any circumstances they will be considered invidious by those who may be superseded, and an extensive list of irregular promotions would not only impair the value of such promotions to the recipients, but tend to demoralization of the service. The war having terminated, it is eminently proper that those most distinguished should receive suitable professional reward. Difficulty will, however, attend any selection that may be made; for where there are discriminations dissatisfaction must follow. The records of the Department, however, and the report of the officers, as well as the investigations made, indicate, in most cases, the few men who should be selected for the moderate increase which is recommended. Although it will not be possible to give promotion to each and all who are deserving, I sincerely hope that Congress will not, on that account, or for any other cause, wholly ignore the claims of those who have acquired acknowledged distinction in hard-fought victories for the country."

The purpose of that suggestion made by the Secretary of the Navy is to recognize the valuable services of officers who during four years have been engaged, some of them, almost in constant battle, and to enable them to be promoted, even if it may be at the expense of others who have not seen any service during that time. Whether this suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy should be acquiesced in is a matter for the Senate to determine.

The Committee on Naval Affairs have added at the end of the first section a clause which will allow an increase in the number of rear admirals on the retired list. The purpose of this is to allow certain men, having reached the age of sixty-two years or having performed forty-five years of service for the country, and performed it well, to the acceptance of the country and with the approbation of the Department, to go upon the retired list with the advanced rank of rear admiral. The amount of extra pay that will be allowed to each of them is $200, and it is a question for the Senate to determine whether or not a man who has been reared solely to that profession, who has never had any facilities for acquiring a fortune in any other pursuit, who has rendered valuable service, whose record stands fair at the Department, shall be permitted, at the decline of life, to have the little pittance of an additional $200, with the additional rank of a rear admiral. It also authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to put on this active list some gentlemen who have already been retired under the operation of the law passed in 1862 as commodores, and who now stand on the Register as commodores, but who while they were post captains under the old condition of things were in the command of squadrons.

The second section of the bill, as it came from the Navy Department, the Naval Committee have not seen fit to recommend the Senate to adopt.

The third section the committee have taken substantially, with the exception of the number, from a bill passed through the House of Representatives; and it allows seventy-five persons—the House bill allowed one hundred and fifty—to be selected from the volunteer naval service; that is to say, from the persons who performed service as volunteer officers in the Navy during the rebellion. It allows five lieutenant commanders, ten lieutenants, twenty masters, and forty ensigns to be appointed from that class. The committee thought that it was due to the gentlemen who performed valuable service to the country as volunteer naval officers that there should be this recognition of their services; and if the committee had believed that there would be a larger number who would be able to pass the necessary examination, I think I am justified in saying that the committee would be willing to recommend that a larger number should be provided for. But there is one suggestion to be taken into consideration, and which, I am free to confess, governed my mind in a very great degree on that subject. If there be one thing more than another that is necessary to be done in connection with the Navy it is to nationalize it, to cause every man throughout the length and breadth of the land to feel, as we have not been very much in the habit of feeling, that he was just as deeply interested in the Navy as a man living along the coast. I am conscious that if we adopt a large number of these volunteer officers into the Navy they will be selected almost entirely from three or four States. A man who is employed on the Mississippi flotilla may know nothing about navigation. He may have done very good service; he may be an excellent and valuable man, but he might be utterly unable to pass the necessary examination to enable him to enter the regular naval service. So it would be with persons who have hitherto been employed upon the lakes, where their navigation is done principally by the compass and running by headlands. That, I am free to confess, although it may not have influenced other members of the committee, had a considerable influence on my mind. Now, if this amendment be adopted there can be no injury done to the regular officers, because they will be promoted one hundred and forty-five numbers under the first section of the bill. We shall at the same time recognize the services of our volunteer officers by accepting, if they can pass the requisite examination, seventy-five of them into the regular service.

The fourth section wholly refers to the question of examination as to the qualifications of volunteer officers.

The fifth section authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to retain such volunteer officers as are now in the service as may be necessary until the lower grades of the service shall be filled up by graduates of the Naval Academy. The law as it now stands upon the statute-book authorized the Secretary of the Navy to appoint certain persons as volunteer officers of the Navy, but it provided that when the rebellion ceased their offices should expire. I suppose that when a proclamation shall be issued by the President to that effect the rebellion will cease. I do not know when that period is going to arrive or what criterion we are going finally to settle down upon as being the proper evidence of when the rebellion ceased; but it must be sometime or other, and it may be any day. This is simply to authorize the Secretary to continue the officers in office who may be upon foreign stations at the time that that proclamation shall be issued or that it shall be understood that the rebellion has ceased.

Section six provides that lieutenant commanders may be assigned to duty as navigation and watch officers on board of vessels of war as well as lieutenants of naval stations and ships of war. There is a provision now in the law that seems to indicate that lieutenant commanders can only be used on shipboard, afloat, as executive officers or in command of vessels. This is simply to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to detail them as watch officers; that is, in a subordinate position from that which they now claim that they are entitled wholly to perform.

Section seven provides that the annual compensation of the Admiral of the Navy shall be $10,000 a year, and that he shall be entitled to the services of a secretary, who shall receive the annual sea pay of a lieutenant. I need not say that that provision was intended for the benefit of Vice Admiral Farragut.

I believe that these are all the provisions of the bill that it is necessary for me to explain. In fact I have stated what they all are substantially.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Iowa as to how the bill would operate in the case of a valuable officer who might have been sent abroad and kept abroad during most of the time during the rebellion and had no opportunity to distinguish himself particularly. I suppose there were such cases where the man would gladly have had an opportunity if he could.

Mr. GRIMES. There may be cases where under the operation of this law what is apparent injustice may be done, what may actually be injustice; but at the same time I must be permitted to say that it seems unjust that a man who has been constantly in service for four years should not be promoted over a man who applied at the beginning of the war to be sent to the Pacific, and who remained there during the whole war and did not see a shot fired in anger.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose he was sent without his application and kept abroad.

Mr. GRIMES. In such a case we must leave it to the discretion of the Secretary or the President, if we pass this bill, and to his sense of justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment reported by the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section one, line four, after the word "one" to insert "admiral, one;" so as to make the section read:

That the number allowed in each grade of line officers on the active list of the Navy shall be one admiral, one vice admiral, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How does it stand now?

Mr. GRIMES. I will state that the bill as reported by the committee proposes to make one admiral, and reduces the number of rear admirals from eleven to ten. The bill as sent to us by the Secretary of the Navy provided for eleven rear admirals. We have reduced that number from eleven to ten and made one full admiral.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What rank does Admiral Farragut hold now?

Mr. GRIMES. He is now vice admiral.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is he not the only vice admiral?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir. I will state that this amendment was put in to give Admiral Farragut a corresponding rank to that which is contemplated to be bestowed upon General Grant. All these ranks are relative; the Navy rank corresponding with that of the Army. A bill has been passed by the House of Representatives making General Grant a full general; and then it was proposed that Admiral Farragut should be made a full admiral.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What pay does he get?

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Maine asks me what pay he has now. He now has, when at sea, $7,000; when on shore duty $6,000; and when on leave or waiting orders, $5,000. I wish to say right here that Admiral Farragut is now on leave and gets $5,000 a year. The officer in the United States Army of corresponding rank gets between seventeen and eighteen thousand dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir, now; and the bill creating the grade of general, as I understand, as it is proposed to be passed by the Committee on Military Affairs, will give him about twenty thousand dollars. Now, it is proposed by this bill to make an admiral and give him all the time a salary of $10,000. I think the Senators from New York will say that that is not a very large sum for a man to live upon in New York; and I think the country will say that if there be any man who is really entitled to $10,000 a year salary, it is Admiral Farragut.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I have any objection to the increase of salary proposed; but, as I understand it, Admiral Farragut, being now vice admiral, is the only vice admiral.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He stands at the head of the whole naval service, just as General Grant does in the Army. The office of vice admiral was created for him on account of his gallant services, and after all those services had been performed. Sir, I think that one great difficulty we shall have to contend with in this country will be this striking propensity to hero worship. We do all that we can think of for a man; we place him at the very head of his profession, giving him the first place in it, and then, after we have put him up so that he can be distinguished no more in our Navy, we propose to create a still additional new rank to confer upon him in order to further testify our respect for the individual. I suppose, in reality, that this is more designed for somebody who is to succeed Admiral Farragut as vice admiral. At any rate, it leaves that office open, and it must be filled by somebody. I do not think that for the leading officer of our Navy $10,000 is too high a salary, and especially for a man who has rendered the distinguished services that Admiral Farragut has.

I have considered somewhat the proposition to create the rank of general for General Grant. I have the highest regard and respect and admiration for both these distinguished men. I think they have deserved well of their country, and should be honored by their country, as they are; but, sir, I think in a Republic like ours there must be some limitation to this hero worship, and the disposition to push men forward by continued rewards after the time has gone by, and they have already been rewarded to the utmost extent that the law will allow, and high offices created for them. With my present impressions, much as I admire and respect General Grant, I should not vote to create the office of general for him; and the same objection lies in my mind to the creation of this new office of admiral. I think the present salary is too low, and I would vote with pleasure to raise the salary of Vice Admiral Farragut, if he remains in that position, to $10,000. I do not think it is too much. But, sir, let us consider one fact; and that is, that after all his distinguished services were rendered, we created for him, in order to put him at the head of the Navy, an office that would elevate him over all his compeers, a new office of vice admiral, and raised his salary somewhat accordingly. He stands at the very head of the Navy of the United States. The same is true of General Grant. We created for him the office of lieutenant general; we placed him at the head of the Army, and gave him a pay which the Senator from Iowa states now amounts to sixteen or seventeen thousand dollars a year; and besides that, the nation, or individuals of the nation, have heaped upon him private benefits and rewards. He has been honored in every way.

I think we have something else to do in this country besides devoting our attention exclusively to these very distinguished men. Due honor should be paid to them; all honor, all respect, should be paid to them; our sense of their services should be testified to every reasonable extent; but it is not worth while, in a republican Government, to run mad after men. When men have been placed, as a reward for their services, and as a testimony of the admiration of the country, so high that they can get no higher in the line of their profession; when they are at the very head and front of all the men in the respective lines which they occupy, for Congress then to turn about to see if it cannot create some new office to push them on a step farther strikes me as setting an example which, if followed out in this Republic, will lead to a great deal of difficulty, and to a forgetfulness of the principles upon which the Republic itself is founded.

I have thought of this subject anxiously and carefully, and with all my regard and respect and admiration for these distinguished men, I cannot bring my mind, after the full and ample rewards that have been given them in the way of honor, to create new offices for the sake of doing something more. I shall therefore vote against creating the rank of admiral, after one rank has been created for and filled by Admiral Farragut; but I will vote to increase his pay to the amount of $10,000 with pleasure. I think that is not too much to give him.

Mr. GRIMES. I agree in nearly everything the Senator from Maine has said, and I do not know but that I agree in all of it; and I believe that I will compromise this matter by proposing to strike out the word "admiral," so as not to create that grade, and to insert another section raising the salary of Vice Admiral Farragut to the sum proposed in the seventh section. If the Senator from Maine will agree to that, I think I can speak for the Committee on Naval Affairs that that will be satisfactory.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If this vote is to be taken as the sense of the Senate, not only on the question of creating the grade of admiral, but also on the question of creating the grade in the Army of general, I desire to say a single word on that subject. On the question of creating the grade of general, with the expectation that Lieutenant General Grant will be appointed to that grade, I confess that my own judgment has been in favor of that proposition. My reason is not that I have any higher regard for his distinguished services than my honorable friend from Maine has; but General Grant was appointed lieutenant general before he took command of the army of the Potomac, and he served in the rank and position of lieutenant general for a year and a half, almost two years. All the other officers of the Army who through the last year and a half of the rebellion distinguished themselves, have, by some act on the part of the Government, received proofs of the approbation of the Government of their conduct during the last year and a half of the prosecution of the war.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They received only barren brevets.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My friend says they received but barren brevets; but, sir, those brevets were bestowed in consideration of distinguished and gallant and meritorious services. As General Grant held the office of lieutenant general during the last year and a half of the rebellion, and performed such distinguished services as he did, I think it is but a matter of justice on the part of Congress to show its approbation of his conduct, either by the creation of the grade of general, or in some other way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is House joint resolution No. 52.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that all prior orders be suspended, in order that we may proceed with the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order can be laid aside by unanimous consent, no objection being made.

Mr. HARRIS. If the debate is not to be continued on this bill I will consent; otherwise I cannot.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not want to debate it.

Mr. HARRIS. I will allow it to go on a little while.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order will be laid aside informally.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will conclude all I have to say in a moment. I do not see that it is inconsistent with a republican Government that we should have an admiral at the head of the Navy, or that we should have a general at the head of the Army. I think that the gentlemen to whom reference has been made have, by their services in a war compared with which hardly any war of modern times can be mentioned, so distinguished themselves that they deserve the rank and the position which belong to them as the head of the Army and the head of the Navy.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would not wish it to be understood that, as a member of the committee, I voted for this bill merely to confer a title. I thought that the bill brought about a proper organization of the Navy Department and of the naval officers; and upon that principle I supported it. I thought that there ought to be at the head of the Navy an admiral. Of course the attention of the country is drawn to one distinguished officer of the Navy to fill that position; but my vote for the bill in committee was not given simply to confer a title; and it would not be given to confer a title upon any man in the world, without reference to what I thought was the interest of the public service. I was a little surprised that the chairman should withdraw that portion of the bill, but if he chooses to do it I shall not object. I thought the bill was well drawn, and preferred it as it stood.

Mr. GRIMES. I have not withdrawn it.
Mr. HENDRICKS. The criticism made by the Senator from Maine on the action of the committee, in that regard, I think, is not sustained by the facts. It is not for the purpose of conferring rank, but for the purpose of bringing about a proper organization of the Navy. Upon that principle I supported it, and upon that principle I shall vote for the bill now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the Senator how it affects the organization of the Navy except by making new offices? Is not Admiral Farragut now at the head of the Navy as vice admiral, and the only one?

Mr. HENDRICKS. We want a vice admiral under him also.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have not heard it argued why we want a vice admiral under him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We want a regular grade of officers from admiral down, and this bill brings that about.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a mere matter of form—a mere matter of name.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the bill is right. The proposed pay of the admiral certainly is not large, if we take into consideration the amount that is paid to Lieutenant General Grant, whom we propose to make a full general. I believe his pay is sixteen or seventeen thousand dollars a year. This bill proposes for the head of the Navy but $10,000. That certainly is not very much if the other be at all right.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That I have expressed my willingness to vote for.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Our Navy has very much increased, and I think the rank is not too high for the head of what we think is as great a navy as there is in the world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee in section one, line four, to insert the words "admiral, one."

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to have the yeas and nays on that amendment. I shall vote against it.

Mr. GRIMES. Take them in the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, I will call for them in the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line five, to strike out the word "eleven" and insert "ten," so as to read, "ten rear admirals."

Mr. FESSENDEN. It strikes me that that follows upon the other amendment; and we shall have to take the vote on both together.

Mr. GRIMES. No.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose the Senate should reject the first amendment, would this amendment stand or have to be altered?

Mr. GRIMES. No; it would not have to be altered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line ten, after the word "grades" to strike out the words "below that of rear admiral and above that of lieutenant," and in line twelve, after the word "selection," to insert "from the grade next below;" so that the clause will read:

Provided, That the increase in the grades authorized by this act shall be made by selection from the grade next below of officers who have rendered the most efficient and faithful service during the recent war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, lines fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen, to strike out "vacancies in the grade above commodore on the active and retired lists shall be filled by selection from the grade next below, and;" so that the clause will read:

And provided further, That the number of rear admirals, including all on the active and retired lists, shall not exceed twenty-one.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the first section, after "exceed twenty-one," the following words:

Exclusive of rear admirals retired after the passage of this act, and of officers now on the retired list of commodores, who have commanded squadrons by order of the Secretary of the Navy, and who may be promoted to the grade of rear admiral on the retired list.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the second section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That after the increase authorized by this act, vacancies occurring in the grades of commissioned line officers of the Navy below that of rear admiral, and of line officers of the Marine corps below that of the colonel commandant, shall be filled by selection and by promotion according to the rule of seniority, alternately, that is to say, if the vacancy first occurring in any such grade be filled by selection, the next vacancy in the same grade shall be filled by seniority, and so on in alternation: Provided, That no such vacancy shall be filled by the selection of any officer having more than one third of the officers of the grade from which the promotion is to be made senior to him in rank or position on the Register: And provided further, That such selection shall be made from officers possessing the highest character, professional qualifications and attainments, including a knowledge of steam engineering, of the French and Spanish languages, and international law, and having a clear record at the Department of honorable service; and the Secretary of the Navy, in case of doubt, or if he deem it necessary, shall convene a board of officers to assist him by their advice in making such selections, and no promotions made by authority of this act shall be considered as precluding the advancement in rank now authorized by law for distinguished conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line three, to strike out "twenty" before "lieutenants" and insert "ten;" to strike out "fifty" before "masters" and insert "twenty;" and in line four to strike out "seventy-five" before "ensigns" and insert "forty;" so that the clause will read:

That of the number of line officers of the Navy on the active list, five lieutenant commanders, ten lieutenants, twenty masters, and forty ensigns may be appointed from those officers who have served in the volunteer naval service for a period of not less than two years, and who are either now in that service or have been honorably discharged therefrom.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line six, after the word "navy" to strike out "as;" in line seven, after the word "ability," to insert "professional competency;" in line eight, after "service" to strike out "twice;" after "to be," at the end of the eighth line, to insert "appointed and;" and after the word "act" in line ten, to strike out "from whom he shall select the persons to be appointed to each of those grades;" so that as amended the section will read:

That the Secretary of the Navy shall appoint a board consisting of not less than three naval officers superior in rank to the officers to be thus appointed in the regular Navy from the volunteer service, which board, after examination of the claims of all candidates, shall select and report to the Secretary of the Navy the most meritorious in character, ability, professional competency, and honorable service, the number to be appointed and transferred to the several grades mentioned in the third section of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert an additional section to come in as section six:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That lieutenant commanders may be assigned to duty as navigation and watch officers on board of vessels-of-war as well as first lieutenants of naval stations and of ships-of-war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the annual compensation of the Admiral of the Navy shall be $10,000 a year, and he shall be entitled to the services of a secretary, who shall receive the annual salary of a lieutenant in the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the bill by inserting as a new section at the close the following:

And be it further enacted, That naval constructors and first and second assistant engineers in the Navy shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and shall have naval rank and pay as officers of the Navy.

As the law now stands, first and second assistant engineers are merely appointed officers and hold no commission from the President of the United States. This is to grant commissions to those officers and to give naval rank and position to the naval constructors who are now officers of a sort of amphibious character, partly civil and partly military, land and water.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to move an amendment to the first section of the bill. It is to insert after the word "selection" in line twelve the words "of officers;" and after the word "below" in the same line to insert the word "or;" and then after the word "officers" in the thirteenth line to insert "who have acted in the same or a higher grade by order of the Secretary of the Navy and," so as to make the clause read:

Provided, That the increase in the grades authorized by this act shall be made by selection of officers from the grade next below, or of officers who have acted in the same or a higher grade by order of the Secretary of the Navy, and who have rendered the most efficient and faithful service during the recent war.

I hope this amendment will have the assent of the committee, and if I can get their attention for a moment I think I can make it understood. The committee's bill authorizes officers to be promoted by selection from one grade to another on account of meritorious services during the war; they do not go up by regular gradation. For instance, the commodores are eligible to the position of rear admiral; in order to be a rear admiral a person must be a commodore; but the Secretary selects among the commodores. They do not go up according to their seniority. He may take a junior commodore and put him over a senior.

The amendment I propose is that where during the war any officer has been assigned to duty in a particular rank by order of the Secretary of the Navy, and has performed meritorious duty there, signal service, which entitles him to promotion, he shall be eligible to promotion as if he actually filled that grade. That is the whole effect of it. I do not know how many officers it will cover, but it will cover some.

Mr. GRIMES. One.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There are more than that, I presume. When I spoke to the chairman of the committee about this matter the other day, I understood him to say that it would cover a good many.

Mr. GRIMES. I have been examining it, and I find that it will only cover one.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know how many it will cover; but if it covers but one, the principle is important. It should be decided upon principle, and not upon the mere question whether it covers one officer or ten.

The principle of the bill is that officers of high grades are to be selected from the grade next below, who have rendered the most efficient and faithful service during the recent war. Now, if in the grade of captain there was no captain whom the Secretary of the Navy and the President were willing to trust to perform the duties of a captain, and it became necessary to call a lieutenant, Lieutenant Worden, if you please, or anybody else, to discharge the duties of captain, and he discharged those duties during the war, and while he was acting in the position of captain he rendered the most efficient and faithful service to the Government during the war, I ask if he ought not to be eligible to promotion just the same as if he had been a captain regularly. You propose by this bill to make the test of promotion efficient and faithful service during the war in a particular grade. Now, if a man acts in that grade by command of the Secretary of the Navy, and renders the service, ought he not to be eligible to promotion just the same as if he had belonged to that grade? If not, you ought to strike out this provision in the bill which allows selections at all. Either let them go up by regular promotion, or else, where a man has performed service in the grade, make him eligible to promotion. Whether anybody would be promoted under my amendment, whether a single individual would be promoted under it, is not, in my judgment, the question. I think, as a principle, it ought to be open to promotion of the person who has performed the service in that grade by command of the Secretary of the Navy; not an accidental service that has been thrown upon him, but where he has been selected and detailed for the service in the grade, and has done it faithfully and efficiently during the war. I ask upon what principle you will now promote a captain whom you would not trust during the war, and will not allow a person to be eligible to promotion whom you assigned to perform that very captain's duty. I hope the committee will agree to the proposition; it seems to me eminently a just principle.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not going to argue this question, because I am acting here upon the sufferance of the Senator from New York, I believe, and I do not want to trespass upon his time. I am sorry to say to the Senator from Illinois that, for one, I cannot consent to his amendment. The principle which he advocates may be a very good one, but why does he not extend it to all the grades? Why does he confine it to this particular grade so as to include one man whom he desires to make a rear admiral? If there be value in his principle—and I think that it is substantially right—why not carry it further?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Iowa does not understand me. I do not wish to interfere with the general principle of the bill. That would throw it open to promote entirely without regard to grades at all for efficient services. That would be a very vital change in the bill. I restricted the amendment so that it should be confined still to those who acted in the grade. I thought it was less a departure from the principle of the bill. In my judgment, the proper principle would be to promote for merit, if we could have it rightly done; but still I do not wish to make such a radical proposition at present.

Mr. GRIMES. In that opinion of the Senator from Illinois I entirely concur; and if it were possible to do so I would gladly accept of any proposition by which every officer in the public service should be promoted by merit and not by mere seniority; but we have got to take the condition of things as we find it, and such a proposition as that would overturn and destroy the Navy. For one I cannot consent to agree that there shall be an exception made in behalf of one particular person, but I am willing that the vote shall be taken without any further remark.

The question being put on the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes 10, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Connors, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Howard, Morrill, Riddle, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Wade, and Williams—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cragin, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Norton, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Van Winkle, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Sprague, Sumner, Willey, Wright, and Yates—18.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, and unless some Senator desires a separate vote, the question will be taken on all the amendments collectively.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to have a separate vote on the first amendment, and also on the amendment inserting the seventh section which is connected with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments not excepted.

The amendments were concurred in.

The Secretary read the first excepted amendment, which was to insert the words "admiral, one," in line four, so as to read, "the number allowed in each grade of line officers on the active list of the Navy shall be one admiral, one vice admiral," &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Upon that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. As several Senators have inquired of me the effect of this amendment, I will say that those who desire to make an admiral, a full admiral, who is intended, of course, under the law, if it passes, to be Admiral Farragut, will vote "yea," and those who are opposed to creating any such grade will vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to inquire whether the adoption of this amendment will not make not only an admiral but another vice admiral.

Mr. GRIMES. We have the grade of vice admiral now, and of course it will have to be filled by somebody else. This simply creates the new grade of admiral, and that admiral must be selected from the grade below, which is vice admiral. Therefore those who desire to make Vice Admiral Farragut a full admiral will vote "yea."

Mr. FESSENDEN. And somebody else a vice admiral.

Mr. GRIMES. Of course.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Cragin, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Norton, Ramsey, Stewart, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Connors, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Morrill, Pomeroy, Riddle, and Saulsbury—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, Wright, and Yates—20.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The other excepted amendment was to insert the following as section seven:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the annual compensation of the Admiral of the Navy shall be $10,000 a year, and he shall be entitled to the services of a secretary, who shall receive the annual sea pay of a lieutenant in the Navy.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. On the motion of Mr. GRIMES, its title was amended by the addition of the words "and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. No. 350) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to pay those employed as examiners and assistant examiners the salary fixed by law for the duties performed by them.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 492) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THOMAS D. ELIOT of Massachusetts, Mr. JOHN W. LONGYEAR of Michigan, and Mr. JAMES M. HUMPHREY of New York, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 85) for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 120) to extend to the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, of West Virginia, the provisions of the act approved July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) relative to appointments to the Military Academy of the United States; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

REPAIRS OF THE POTOMAC BRIDGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is House joint resolution No. 52.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire, with the indulgence of the Senate, by the permission of the Senator from New York, who has charge of that matter, to be allowed now to take up the House joint resolution appropriating $10,000 for the repairs of the Potomac bridge. It has been for some time before the Senate, and there is a great and, it is said, an urgent necessity for its passage.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope that will not be done if the unfinished business is to lose its precedence.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course not. I will give way if the joint resolution gives rise to the slightest discussion.

The motion of Mr. MORRILL was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 43) making an appropriation for the repair of the Potomac bridge was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appropriate $10,000 to enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to place the Potomac bridge in such repair as to render it permanently passable, the work to be done immediately after the approval of this joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PARIS UNIVERSAL EXHIBITION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) to provide for the expenses attending the exhibition of the products of industry of the United States at the Exhibition at Paris in 1867, the pending question being upon the amendment of Mr. GRIMES to the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. The amendment of Mr. GRIMES was to add to the second section of the committee's amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That no officer shall be appointed and no money paid under the provisions of this resolution until the Imperial Government of France shall first give ample and reliable assurances to this Government that the French troops and all French military officers shall be immediately withdrawn from the just territorial jurisdiction of the republic of Mexico.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall say nothing in reference to the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Iowa. I cannot vote for it certainly, because I do not see its relevancy to the resolution under consideration. I should be opposed to saying to the Emperor of France, "Provided you withdraw your troops from Mexico, we will send you friendly messages." I do not propose any such bargain as that to so distinguished a personage. I wish, however, to make one remark upon the resolution. While I am not hostile to the objects and purposes of this joint resolution, I cannot vote for it unless the honorable Senator from New York can inform me where Congress gets the constitutional authority to make this appropriation. It is no answer to say that Congress heretofore has made appropriations of this character. Where, let me ask, is the constitutional authority in Congress to appropriate money for the purpose of sending articles of manufacture, or any other articles, to Paris to be put upon exhibition? Is the power of Congress over the Treasury omnipotent, so that they can appropriate the public money for any and for every purpose whatever? Is there no limitation upon that power as to the objects and purposes of the appropriation? Can they make an appropriation to have an exhibition of wild or tame animals at any point in the United States or any point beyond the limits of the United States? If you have got the power under the Constitution to appropriate money out of the public Treasury for an object of this kind, you have got the power to appropriate money out of the public Treasury to have annual agricultural fairs, annual exhibitions of stock raised in the United States, and the power to send specimens of those stocks to foreign countries for exhibition.

I will not argue the question. It seems to me the mere presentation of the case is sufficient. Sir, we have gone far enough in this species of legislation, in holding that we have absolute control over the public purse, and that we may empty out its contents into the lap of anybody and of everybody, anywhere and everywhere, for any and for every purpose. It is time such legislation should stop.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have this morning been put in possession of some information in relation to the Mexican question, which, while I do not deem it very important in reference to the subject immediately pending before the Senate, may be interesting to the Senate upon the general question of Mexican affairs. I have in my hand extracts from a letter coming from a source which, if I were at liberty to mention it, would be very satisfactory to every Senator. It is a letter from Paris, just received, which states as follows:

"It is the policy of the French Government to avoid any new negotiation with the Cabinet of Washington, but it is its clear determination to recall its troops and even to anticipate the term of eighteen months already appointed as necessary for the French evacuation. This policy is so evident that in looking at the facts you can rely upon a very early execution. The orders are already given from the French War Department to recall in the next October the most important part of the total amount of French troops now in Mexico. When the number of their troops which are to be withdrawn within the next fall shall be known in the United States, it will satisfy the most exacting parties that the remainder of the French army will be recalled in the next spring."

Mr. HOWARD. I sincerely hope, sir, that the information furnished by the honorable Senator from New York may be relied upon, and that we shall soon see the complete evacuation of the Mexican territory by the French troops. Of course I am entirely ignorant of the source of the information; and notwithstanding the confidence with which the honorable Senator seems to regard that information, I must take the liberty to express a doubt as to such a result. Sir, the number of French troops within the Mexican territory at the present time is not less than fifty thousand, and until a very recent period the number has been increasing from time to time by accretions from France and Belgium and other places in Europe where the Emperor has been able to pick up troops and send them to Mexico. Among these troops is a force which is known as the "foreign legion," consisting of eight thousand troops.

Now, sir, as to the probability of the withdrawal of the French troops from Mexico next October or next November, or at any definite time in the future, I beg to call the attention of the honorable Senator from New York to the convention which was entered into between the Emperor of the French and Maximilian under date of the 10th of April, 1864, a solemn treaty between the two sovereigns:

"The Government of his Majesty the Emperor of the French and that of his Majesty the Emperor of Mexico, animated by an equal desire to insure the reestablishment of order in Mexico, and to consolidate the new empire, have resolved to arrange by a convention the conditions of the stay of the French troops in this country."

Now comes the stipulation:

"ARTICLE 1. The French troops which are now in Mexico will be reduced as soon as possible to a corps of twenty-five thousand men, including the foreign legion.

"This corps, to protect the interests which have caused the intervention"—

That is the corps of eight thousand men, to protect the peculiar interests of the Emperor of the French and of Maximilian, "which have caused the intervention in Mexico" will remain. That interest is nothing more nor less, as we all know, than the downright conquest of Mexico by the French arms and its retention by France under the frivolous and shallow pretext of a protectorate in favor of the scion of the house of Hapsburg known as Maximilian.

"This corps, to protect the interests which have caused the intervention, will remain temporarily in Mexico"—

Temporarily!

"under the conditions arranged by the following articles."

"ARTICLE 2. The French troops will evacuate Mexico according as his Majesty the Emperor of Mexico shall be able to organize the troops necessary to replace them."

"ARTICLE 3. The foreign legion in the service of France, composed of eight thousand men, will nevertheless still remain for six years in Mexico"—

I desire the especial attention of the honorable Senator from New York to this clause. The foreign legion is to remain at least six years in Mexico—

"after all the forces shall have been recalled, conformably to article two. Dating from this moment, the said legion shall pass into the service and pay of the Mexican Government. The Mexican Government reserves to itself the faculty of shortening the duration of the employment of the foreign legion in Mexico."

The French army, by this solemn treaty between the two Emperors, is to remain in Mexico until his Majesty the Emperor of Mexico shall be able to "organize the forces necessary to replace them," that is, to replace the French troops. How long will that be? How long will it require the Emperor Maximilian to muster troops enough, composed of Mexicans and Austrians and all other nationalities, to replace the French army in Mexico and maintain himself on the throne? No, sir; the stipulation of the Emperor of the French thus entered into with Maximilian looks forward to the permanent and perpetual maintenance of the Emperor Maximilian upon the throne of Mexico. So long as he shall find it necessary to maintain himself upon that throne by means of foreign aid, so long the Emperor of the French is bound to aid him and continue his forces in Mexico.

As throwing some further light on the continuance of the French troops in Mexico, I beg to read an extract from an article published in what is called the Memorial Diplomatique, in Paris, dated March 12, 1865. It has the air of authority in it; I have no doubt it is entirely official. That journal says, after commenting upon the convention to which I have already made allusion:

"Should, however, the reorganization of the Mexican army progress sufficiently rapid to render the complete evacuation possible at some not distant future, the foreign legion, which realizes an effective of eight thousand men, would still continue to unfurl the French flag in Mexico for six whole years after the departure of all the other troops, unless the Emperor Maximilian should judge it expedient to shorten the duration of its employment. Thus imposing as seems the force of bayonets of which the United States will be able to dispose if they end the fratricidal war which at present divides them, there is very little fear that they will be disposed to make an attack upon Mexico, where, for eight or ten years still, they are sure to meet the French flag; and should they forget that it is to the generous cooperation of France that they owe their own independence, they could not be ignorant that the Government of the Emperor Napoleon III does not compound in a matter of honor and dignity."

I refer to these passages as a reply to the assurance given us by the honorable Senator from New York, based upon the paper which he has read to us, that it is highly probable the French troops are about to be recalled from Mexico. No, sir; I think this talk about the withdrawal of the French troops from Mexico is a mere amusement, and notwithstanding the many assurances that we have had, direct and indirect, that they are about to be withdrawn, I have no idea at all that the Emperor of the French contemplates the withdrawal of the French army from Mexico. French pride is concerned in that question, French honor, French dignity, French glory. It is to-day a French conquest, so far as the conquest has extended, and France now holds it by the iron grip of war and conquest, and so she intends to hold it for the future, and I regret to say that her progress in Mexico has, in my humble judgment, been in a great degree owing to our own difficulties at home, if you please to call it so, our own weakness, produced by the civil war through which we have just passed, and also to a want of manly firmness and courage on the part of our own Government in its negotiations and its relations with that of France. Until we have some new policy in our foreign affairs, a policy which shall in some form assert the ancient and time-honored Monroe doctrine, you will see no withdrawal of the French troops from Mexico.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to say a word about the amendment and upon the subject of the Exposition itself. I understand that the different nations of the world propose to hold a sort of general Exhibition in Paris, by and by, to show off their industry, the relative industries of the different nationalities. Whether it is wise or unwise for the United States to participate in such an Exhibition was, at one time, an open question; but I understand we have already passed upon it and concluded, resolved to participate in that Exhibition. My own impression is that the decision was a wise one. I do not know of any reason that should prevent the industry of the United States appearing where the industry of other nations is exhibited. The Senator from Iowa says it will cost a good deal. I suppose it will cost all nations a good deal; but I am not sure that we cannot afford the expense. Several of these Exhibitions have been held heretofore, and I believe we have generally approved of them. We made but a very meager and a somewhat beggarly appearance, I think, in the last one that was held. I think we refused to make any appropriation for that purpose. The argument was that we were just embarking in a war; we did not exactly know who owned the United States; and it was thought more prudent for us not to appear in that industrial congress of nations. I thought otherwise then, and said otherwise. I thought that as long as we pretended to be a nation, if we were not so effectually stunned by the war that we could not walk at all, it was our business to walk into whatever congresses other nations did go into, if they were right and proper in themselves.

I do not think the mere consideration of expense should deter us from appearing at this congress. It seems that it is to be held in France; and I judge from the debate that has already taken place that the Emperor of France is not popular here in the Senate and in the United States. That may very well be. His merits have not been canvassed recently. I do not know what the popular verdict would be touching the Emperor Napoleon. But the Exhibition is not to be held in his parlor, or in any of his counting-rooms, or in any of his parks. It is to be held in the city of Paris, I understand. France is an existing nation, and whether we like or dislike the reigning monarch there, I do not think that is a good reason for our refusing to participate in an exhibition which is to take place there.

I have seen Executives in this country who were not very popular with me. I do not think that the want of popularity on the part of any of our Presidents would be a good reason why Great Britain, or France, or Russia, or any other nationality of the world, should refuse to participate in an exhibition of industry to take place in the city of New York, or Boston, or elsewhere. So I do not think we ought to determine this question with reference to our peculiar opinions of the political merits or demerits of the Emperor Napoleon.

But it is said that a youthful son of his is to preside over this Exhibition. I did not know that. If he does I hope he will preside successfully and acceptably. I do not think, if he is so very young as he is said to be, that he will be capable of doing much to damage the Exhibition; I do not think he will be able to hurt it much; and therefore I should not refuse to participate in the Exhibition on that account.

But the pending amendment raises a different question: The pending amendment suggests to us the propriety of refusing our participation in the Exhibition unless the French troops shall be removed, not from the United States, but from the republic of Mexico down below us. I would not have any particular objection to that amendment if I were sure the French troops would be removed before this Exhibition came off, because then no attention would be attracted to the fact that we had agreed to such a vote. But if that amendment should be adopted and it turned out that the French troops had not been withdrawn by the time the Exhibition came off, I should be very sorry if any inquiry were ever made "why the United States of America are not represented at Paris," the answer should be, "We were pouting, we were in a sulk because there were some French troops in the republic of Mexico."

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate with any discussion of the Monroe doctrine; but I will say just this one thing, that if the existence of these troops or the troops of any other foreign country in the republic of Mexico is an injury to the sovereignty of the United States of America, this is not the way to resent it. If we feel insulted or wronged by the presence of those troops in that republic, let us remove them. There is one way of doing it. This is not the way. France is a sovereign Power; so is Mexico, I take it; and so is the United States at last, I trust; and if we are wronged by this or any other act of national intervention in the affairs of this continent let us proceed to abate that wrong, as sovereign Powers do abate wrongs. We know how that is. But I do not believe it becomes the Republic of the United States to sit here day after day in the Halls of Congress to complain of these acts without taking the proper steps to redress them; and, above all, do I think it unbecoming the dignity of the Republic, if France or Louis Napoleon has ventured upon a step which we feel to be an aggression upon the rights of the United States, to undertake to resent it by simply making faces at his boy.

Mr. WADE. I had not intended to say anything about this subject, because I supposed it was a foregone conclusion that this Exhibition would be attended by the authorities of the United States. I was opposed to it in committee; I am opposed to it now, and for several reasons. One of those reasons is that I am persuaded that the exhibition we shall be able to make there will not be very honorable or very creditable to the United States. We have not had sufficient notice; we have not begun in sufficient time; we are not sufficiently liberal in the appropriations that we have made or propose to make, to make a respectable exhibition there. So well aware of that has the French Emperor been, that by reference to the amount of ground that has been marked off for the United States to occupy among the other nations of the earth that propose to assemble there, it will be seen that there has been less space awarded to us than to any of the little German principalities that propose to go there. They require us, of course, to build our own house, and I believe the appropriation proposed here is not supposed to be more than sufficient to construct the buildings in which the exhibition is to be made. At all events the committee did not find that it could much more than perform that part. We are a great way from the place where this Exhibition is to be held. It is very expensive for us to go there and to take there all those things that we might wish to exhibit. The probability is that we shall make but a very poor show in that distant country compared with those great nations living close at hand, and with materials much easier to be brought and exhibited there than we could do under any circumstances; for those aristocratical and monarchical Governments, where kings and princes contend with the power of nations in their hands, can make a much greater show than a republic can ever make.

I do not know what advantage it is supposed will be gained by any exhibition that we shall make there. Is there any new thing under the sun that will be brought to light there? Is there to be found any new invention unknown to the people of the United States or to the civilized world that we can lay hold of as an improvement, that we have not now perfect knowledge of? I hardly know what advantage this nation expects to get by any exhibition that it shall make there.

These considerations, seeing that we should make such a sorry exhibition there before the nations of the world, led me to believe that it would be better that we should not go there at all. If we could make an exhibition of republican Government, and the fruits of republicanism as administered in our Government, that we think the best in the world, yea; that we know is the best in the world; if we could compare its principles and its effects upon a people with those monarchies, I should be exceedingly emulous for the exhibition; but this is a contest for splendor, for show; and it is for the purpose of building up the greatness, power, and influence of the Emperor of France that this Exhibition is to be held. These are the considerations which have moved that absolute and subtle monarch to gather all the nations of the earth there right under his surveillance and supervision, to make an exhibition for the glory of France and the stability and honor of his throne. It will hardly have any other effect than that. All that he expects from it is from considerations like these. And just in proportion as a Government robs its poor people, robs labor of its just fruits, and accumulates them in the hands of a few, just in that proportion is it able to make a splendid exhibition on such an occasion.

As I said before, I wish we could compare Governments and the fruits of free Governments with the fruits of despotisms as affecting the honor, the intelligence, and the elevation of a whole people. If that could be done, we should do more for republicanism, more for humanity, more for the elevation of the peoples of the world than could be done in any other way. But by this kind of exhibition you only exhibit to the world what robberies privileged classes can make from industry in order to make a show before the world: and to repeat, just in proportion as they rob labor of its fruits, so they will be enabled to make a grand, splendid appearance at this Exhibition.

These, in short, were some of the reasons that induced me before the committee to believe and to vote against our Government interfering at all in this matter. We are to send philosophers and sages there to view this great spectacle! They will come home, one half of them, with their heads turned clear round with the glory of monarchical Governments and the splendid exhibitions that they have made there. Your shallow scientific men will look no deeper than this, and will become imbued with the spirit of monarchical and aristocratic governments. One half of the men we send abroad desert our principles when they have been hanging on a court for not more than a month. Your minister there now is as complete a snob to the court of France as any one who is hereditarily so. That will be the advantage, and I believe all the advantage, that this Government will gain by sending these sages there to take note of this splendid Exhibition. As the Senator from Iowa has said, when that is done they will come here with their programmes and their drawings and their reports, that will be exceedingly costly for us to print and exhibit here, and they will be of no kind of use when they are printed.

Now, sir, as to our relations with France, for that has been involved in this question, what has been the treatment of France toward this nation and toward Mexico? I take that into account when we are invited to make a friendly exhibition. It may not, in one sense, have anything to do with this manifestation of art and science that is to be made in Paris. But, sir, something is due to the self-respect of this great nation. Who is the man that has got up this Exhibition? Who is he that invites us to this banquet? Is he a man who has treated us with consideration and respect all along? When we were involved in great difficulties, when he supposed ruin was staring us in the face, was he then friendly to us and to the Government we represent? Sir, he was our mortal enemy. He is the enemy of mankind, the enemy of the rights and liberties of mankind, as he has shown on all occasions. If any private gentleman were guilty of the same acts of criminality that he is justly charged with and guilty of, not a man in this Senate would associate with him for a moment.

How came he in Mexico? Had the poor inoffensive people of Mexico, struggling against ignorance, against superstition, against every obstacle that impedes the progress of a nation to civilization and to welfare, ever done him, the Emperor of France, any wrong? No, sir, never. He crossed the broad Atlantic to invade a people who had never injured him; and with what pretension did he come? He came there pretending to the nations of Europe and to us that he had a little claim due somehow or other from the people of Mexico to the people of France, and he disavowed any intention of coming for any political purpose whatever. That was his solemn declaration, in order to throw us and surrounding nations off their guard. He seduced even England and Spain into the idea that he wanted them to cooperate barely to collect a debt against Mexico, disavowing utterly any political intention whatsoever, saying that he did not intend to acquire any foothold in Mexico. Was that a false pretense or a true pretense? No man ever went to the penitentiary for obtaining property by false pretenses upon a pretense more false, more disgraceful to human nature, than that he avowed.

When he got there what did he do? He at length disgusted his associates. They finally saw through his scheme, and that they were deceived, and they backed out, and then he was compelled to let the truth be known, that he had gone there with no intention to collect a debt, but with the intention to subvert the republic of Mexico, and trample it under foot, and place there a crowned head of his own making under him as a satrap, and subject the great republic of Mexico to be a mere adjunct of the empire of France. That is what he is after; that is what he designs to do; and why? How has he done it? He has taken his army there. He has invaded Mexico by a military force. He has carried on against that inoffensive people the most barbarous war that has been waged in modern times. He has gone abroad to hunt up another scion of nobility for the time being to take his place and reign in his stead over a strange people; a people republican in all their sentiments; a people endeavoring to imitate us in the great republic that we have formed; a nation that we always wish to be friendly with us; a nation that has reached out its arm and implored us, inasmuch as we had set the example that they were endeavoring to follow by forming a just and free republican Government like our own, to step forth and aid and assist them from this robber. When they did it, they did it upon the well-known and established principles of our own Government, by which for the last fifty years we have declared that we would not at any period suffer European nations to intermeddle with the politics of this continent, and to overthrow the republics here, and to set up monarchies or empires in their stead. If there is any settled, cherished policy of this nation approved by our statesmen from Jefferson until now, that is one of them; and if we surrender it, we most weakly and meanly surrender a great principle as necessary to our true republican progress as the breath of our lives. He has put Maximilian there in his stead; he has maintained him with his troops; he has officered his armies with his own officers; he has even sent men there from his empire to dictate how the war shall be carried on; and what is the effect of it? Why, sir, because these poor Mexicans, struggling to maintain their rights against this foreign robber, whom they had never injured, because they persist in the assertion of their rights, when they are taken as prisoners all the well-known principles of modern warfare are forgotten, and they are ordered to be shot. Why? Because they attempt to defend their liberties and the liberties of their nation against the aggressions of this accursed robber and despot from abroad. That is the reason—a reason that should stir the blood of every republican the world over.

But it is said that we have put up patiently with this for a long time. Sir, I blush; I am ashamed to confess it, that we have. It is the darkest blot upon the escutcheon of the United States that we have suffered it so long. The Emperor of France did not disguise it that his purpose was to put a check, to put a curb in the bit of the Anglo-Saxon race, and to come here for the advancement of the Latin race, and for empire. He told the world that that was his object. It was a declaration of war upon our principles, and he knew it, and it should have been taken in the right spirit; or, if struggling with our gigantic foe, prudence dictated that for the moment we should hold up, the very moment the cloud of war passed away, we should have asserted this great doctrine, and we should have gone forth and put it in practice. Our armies upon the borders of Mexico ought never to have been disbanded until this robber and his cohorts and his creature with the name of Emperor were driven ignominiously from this continent. It could have been as easily done as said. Suppose your triumphant arms had been turned against the creature of this robber, in the assertion of that great principle called the Monroe doctrine, emanating from Thomas Jefferson, and which was thrown into the teeth of the great combination of European despots called the Holy Alliance by Mr. Monroe? At that period, comparatively weak as we were, we had the courage to stare them in the face with all their accumulated power, and say to them, "Take care of your own monarchies and Governments in Europe; but we will not suffer you to come on to this continent to model Governments after your own fashion, and if you do it, you do it at your peril;" and they who had triumphantly driven Bonaparte from his throne, had not the hardihood to encounter the wrath and the enthusiasm of this people stirred up in the defense of this great principle. They left it to us, with our accumulated power and strength, to quail before the mandates of this French Emperor. I say again it is shameful for us, it is a blot upon our character that ought to be wiped out.

But I am told that this very innocent French Emperor has now made up his mind that he will relinquish all his plans; that he will forego all the expense he has incurred; and that he is now ready to back out of the project which he has cherished so long and has maintained thus far with such sacrifices to France, to recall his troops, and to do precisely what we wish him to do. Does anybody believe that he will do it willingly? We were told yesterday of the course he took recently with the French army there. How many times within the last five years has he avowed and asseverated to the people of Europe that it was his purpose to withdraw his army from Italy? Did he ever find the time when he would do it? No, sir; he ever found some pretense to postpone it even until now. He is endeavoring now, with all the power and influence of his empire and of his craft, to postpone the great war that is rising in Europe, for no better purpose undoubtedly than to enable him still to carry out the project he had in view upon this continent. I know that the condition of Europe to-day is perilous. I know that a cloud of war is hanging over the continent of Europe, threatening to involve it in one of the greatest and most terrible contests that the world ever saw. Statesmen believe it must come. Napoleon thinks it is imminent; and therefore, I say again, he is turning all his power and skill toward averting the storm and quelling it without a resort to arms. I see that the great contending nations have paused in their career, and have deferred so far to him as to go into a congress that they refused four years ago to go into. They have stayed their armies. They have consented to negotiate. There is a great congress of kings and emperors and their ministers at Paris in order to settle this great question without a resort to arms. Will they be able to do it? Speculations of statesmen are rife upon that subject. No man now can tell what will be the result of those negotiations. My own opinion is that the power and influence of France can procure peace, and having it in her power to chastise any nation that will go to war against her will, I believe it will have the effect to stay, for a season at least, this resort to arms. If it does, has Napoleon said a word or done a thing that will bind him to withdraw his troops and give up his project in Mexico? Not a word. You may read your letters till doomsday; you may look to all the subtleties that he has resorted to; and I read them all in this way: Napoleon says, "I see great difficulty arising around me; I may find full employment for all the military power I have; therefore I do not wish to provoke a war with the United States until this question is settled one way or the other." But if he finds that he is to be at peace with Europe, my word for it—and never will I rise in the Senate again to declare my opinion of what will take place if I am incorrect, if that question is settled without war—Napoleon will not choose to give up his grasp upon Mexico; nor will our Administration extort from him a promise that he will absolutely do it. He has said nothing; he has done nothing as yet—you cannot put your finger on it—that binds him to withdraw his troops either in October or any other time. He is waiting to see how European affairs turn out; and just as they do turn out, so will he act. It is the dearest project of his heart to subjugate Mexico to an emperor of his own setting up—a man who will be nothing but a mere plaything in his hands. He will have the great empire of Mexico under Maximilian for a while, and then under his son who is to succeed him.

Now, sir, this is the way that I judge upon that question. I do not believe that our intercourse with France is so peaceable. I wish that our Administration would take a direct step in the right direction, following the just, great, noble, courageous counsel of our forefathers, who were weaker than we are, and hurl the same defiance in the teeth of the Emperor of the French and the Emperor of Austria and all Europe, saying, "We will never submit to allow a neighboring republic that has taken us as their model, on our borders, to be overturned against their will and consent, and an accursed emperor set up to tyrannize forevermore upon that people." It is a bad example for us.

Gentlemen may say it is nothing to us what becomes of Mexico. Sir, it is a narrow, selfish policy that will degenerate in the loss of our own liberties if we become so indifferent to the fate of the people who surround us. I say we ought in good neighborhood to stretch forth a friendly arm to that struggling people who are being slaughtered, tortured, starved, put to every inconvenience on God's earth, that this robber may prosper; but we sit down indifferent to it, and see a great republic overturned under our noses, and, with an impudence unknown, a Government set up upon its ruins that we utterly abhor. Sir, with such an emperor as this, so false to all that is liberal, just, and right, so tainted in his private character as a man, with his double dealing and frauds, with his cruelty and barbarity as a statesman, I do not want the United States to have anything to do by way of social intercourse.

It is said that he is to put up his son at the head of this Exhibition as a model for American gentlemen and statesmen to doff their hats to. A young monarch nine years old! Gentlemen may say this is a matter of taste. It is a matter of principle with me. An American citizen never shall, with my consent, be compelled to do this mean obeisance to kings or emperors, or their children. It is not the place for proud republicans to go. The relationship in which we stand to that nation is not such as should permit us to interfere nationally, and by our Government to appear at this grand pageant of this Emperor in order to swell the triumphant splendor of his reign. I am opposed to it. But what I say about the Emperor, and about maintaining our policy and lending our arms to assist Mexico in her troubles, I am for carrying out directly. If you vote down this amendment, then tell me that you will take the lion by the beard and say to him, "You shall not make ruling emperors on our borders to be our neighbors; it is against our principle and humiliating to us; it is intended to degrade us." If you want to show an exhibition of a people, the bravest, the best, the most intellectual, the highest advanced in civilization that the world ever saw—I mean the great mass of our people—exhibit nations, but do not go for their bangles. You will be beat there. I hope to God you will ever be beat in such exhibitions as that. Compare institutions with them; show the beneficence of our Government, how it reaches out a helping hand to offer help to every man, places every man upon an equal platform, where every one can be the artificer of his own fortune; compare that with those nations where kings and emperors reign, and where privileged classes trample down and brutalize the great mass of their people. It will make no exhibition that can be honorable to us to go there. I go against your resolution. I go against any association with them until they repent of their crimes and become honorable men.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I was one of the five that voted in favor of the proposition of the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] in opposition to the predecessor of the measure that is now before the Senate. I have not changed in my opposition to the measure. I was opposed to it partly upon the ground suggested by the honorable Senator from Delaware, and also upon the ground suggested by the honorable Senator from Ohio who has just taken his seat. In addition to my distrust of the power of our Government to take part in such an Exhibition, I thought with him that we were too distant from the theater where this Exhibition is to take place, that the ocean rolling between France and us would render it impossible for the United States to make anything like a respectable appearance at the Exhibition, and therefore I was opposed to it.

I am also opposed to the proposition which the honorable Senator from Iowa has made to amend this resolution, not because I am opposed to the proposition itself, (for that I am in favor of decidedly and unhesitatingly,) but I think it is too grave a proposition, one of too much dignity to be made in connection with the resolution now under consideration. I am informed that an understanding has taken place between the French Government and the Secretary of State that the French forces are to be withdrawn in divisions from Mexico by particular days. Being myself a friend of the Monroe doctrine, having read the papers when it was first announced, and given my youthful and enthusiastic support to that doctrine, it has ever since been a cherished sentiment with me. On any and all occasions where that doctrine can be asserted or practically enforced so as to keep the foot of European Powers from this continent, I am always willing to assert it. If the honorable Senator from Ohio or any other gentleman would introduce a resolution to this purport, that an understanding having been come to by our Government and Louis Napoleon's Government that the French troops shall be withdrawn, according to the terms, not of the stipulation, but according to the mode which he himself decided upon, I believe, under the influence of the protest of our Government against their remaining there, and which was satisfactory to our Government, the Congress of the United States expect him faithfully to execute that purpose as he announced it to our Government, I would vote for such a resolution most cheerfully, and I believe it would receive the unanimous support of Congress, or nearly so. I think that in that form it would be appropriate, and it would have much more moral power, both with the French Government and with the world, than to assert such a principle as that and endeavor to affix it to the present measure as an amendment to it.

Mr. President, I frankly concede that of the ability of the Mexican people for self-government and for the maintenance of free institutions I have very little hope. I believe they are too degenerate, too mongrel, and too inferior in their characteristics to meet the question of the capacity of a people for self-government at all. But however that may be, they have a right to be left alone; they have the right to be uninterrupted by the ambitious projects of Louis Napoleon or Maximilian or any other European potentate or Power; and in the assertion of the Monroe doctrine I would be willing for the Government of the United States to interpose for their protection, and if needs be, to sweep the French forces from Mexico and to leave the people of Mexico to work out their own destinies. I believe, with the honorable Senator from Ohio, that at the close of the late war, and even now, that could be done by the military power of the United States in sixty days. I believe that such an operation would authorize a reëxpression of the famous epistle of Cæsar when he invaded Spain, "Veni, vidi, vici." Whenever Louis Napoleon or the French Government manifests unmistakably a purpose not to evacuate Mexico, but to seek to continue the French power and influence there, through Maximilian or by any other medium, I am then in favor of the United States interfering and bringing all such ambitious purposes to a close. Sir, I am so much a friend to the Monroe doctrine that I believe recently there has been a fit opportunity for a further demonstration of it in relation to other Powers on the continent of America. The invasion by Spain of Chili and Peru, in my humble judgment, was altogether unauthorized, and was a manifestation of the arbitrary power of a nation that was superior in military and naval resources to those republics for the purpose of humiliating them and bringing injury and degradation upon them. It struck me that the attack, bombardment, and destruction in part of Valparaiso by the Spanish forces was an outrage, not only upon the principle of the Monroe doctrine, but also on humanity, and that the naval forces of the United States that were then present in that port ought to have interfered for the purpose of protecting that defenseless city against such a Vandal attack.

With these sentiments, I think the honorable Senator from Ohio and the honorable Senator from Iowa will be satisfied that I am as much in favor of the Monroe doctrine and as much opposed to the occupation of Mexico by the French, or by Maximilian, under the patronage of the French Emperor, as they are; but I do not think that this is the appropriate time or mode in which such a great sentiment of policy upon the part of the Government of the United States in the assertion of the Monroe doctrine, and in its application to the present position of the French empire and power in that country, should be made. I shall therefore vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. I was one of the minority of five to which the honorable Senator from New York alluded, that the Senator from Iowa could command in the first opposition to this measure. I care nothing about standing with a minority of five. I would care nothing for standing in a minority of one besides myself, or even alone in my opposition to this measure, or to any other to which I felt prepared to manifest my opposition. I care not about minorities or majorities, or even the success of measures, or of my opposition to measures. I vote according to my judgment on their merits; and when I have given a vote upon any measure whatever, notwithstanding it may meet the fate of defeat, and a defeat of but five of a minority of opposition or of but one of an opposition, I would stand no less firm in my opposition in relation to the measure.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I think that in giving our attention to these industrial Exhibitions, and giving them our encouragement, we are not making obeisance to kings. It is making our obeisance to the freedom of industry the world over, which to-day commands the obeisance of kings themselves. This Exhibition which is now to be seen in Europe—a repetition, perhaps on a grander scale, of an Exhibition which has already appeared in Great Britain—this grand fair of the nations, has been borrowed from America; it is an American institution. We have them in all our counties. We have them in all our States. We have our national fairs, where the industry of all the States is exhibited. This grand fair of the nations, first taking place in England, now being offered to exhibition in France, is but borrowing an institution from the great Republic of the world; and it is making obeisance to that great principle, freedom of industry, freedom of invention, which makes the great Republic what it is this day, standing as it does in the vanguard of the nations, and leading the industries and the freedom of the world. I do not therefore think there is anything anti-republican, anything inconsistent with the American Republic in its being represented at one of these grand fairs of the nations.

It is said that but little space has been allotted to us in the building which is to be erected in Paris for the Exhibition. It is true that in comparison with the space allotted to neighboring nations, ours is small; but it must be remembered that we are on the other side of the Atlantic ocean from France, three thousand miles away, and that the number of articles that we can put on exhibition cannot compare with those that can be sent by rail one, two, or three hundred miles from the neighboring States. But, sir, there is space enough allotted to us in this grand exhibition of the inventions, the improvements, and the industries of the nations, to enable us to demonstrate to the nations of the world that we are not only foremost in free institutions and in the freedom of industry, but that in the freedom of our inventions we have excelled them all. We can set up the telegraph; we can show the steam engine; we can also show there the great discoveries in medicine and anesthetics—one of the greatest of modern discoveries, by which, in surgical operations, all pain is suspended; one of the greatest blessings that science has vouchsafed to suffering humanity, which alone of itself takes from the terrors of the battlefield one half its suffering, to know that limbs may be amputated without a moment's pain, that not a nerve will feel the incision, while under the influence of this agent, which American genius has discovered and brought to light.

But, sir, I cannot dwell upon these things, and do not intend to take up the time of the Senate in dwelling upon them. I cannot, however, close without making some reference to remarks that have been made by gentlemen here in relation to the Emperor of France and his policy toward Mexico and the United States. Far be it from me to undertake to justify or apologize for the policy adopted by France toward Mexico. Far be it from me to look upon the conduct of France toward the Government of the United States in a friendly light.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Emperor of France has been most woefully disappointed in one of the dreams of his ambition—the dream of his wildest ambition of conquest and of empire in this New World—a dream which he inherited from the slaveholding aristocracy of the South, who, in their mad ambition, would have embraced all Mexico and all the countries around the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean sea, in the idea that they would thus hold within their embrace all the cotton-growing lands, the sugar-growing lands, the coffee-growing lands, and the rice-growing lands of that great portion of the world. That Napoleon, in the dream of his ambition, expected to advance his interests in that direction I have no doubt; but, sir, that dream has failed. What was that dream based upon? It was based upon the idea that the Republic of the United States was overthrown; that the union of these States was broken; that the States which constituted this great Republic were dissevered, belligerent, and that they were dissevered forever, and could not be united; and because he believed that, he took the occasion as his opportunity to seize upon Mexico to establish his power in the New World, and I doubt not with the dream of extending the empire of the Latin race and resisting the extension of the Anglo-Saxon toward the south. But, sir, that dream has utterly failed. The union of these States is not broken, thanks to the superintending providence of Almighty God, first of all, who inspired the hearts of our people and their patriotism to stand fast by the Government of the United States and its institutions; and next do we owe it to our brave and skillful officers, and the men under their command, that we saved the union of these States. Our Union is unbroken. Our flag waves over every foot of the Republic, not a star obscured nor a stripe erased. Every State is still within this Union, and the great Republic composed of the United States of America stands before the world this day in the full panoply of its power both on the land and on the sea.

Napoleon has been awakened from his dream by another consideration. By the armies which we have raised, by the power which we have exhibited, he has awakened from his dream of ambition and has learned that when the American people will it he cannot hold Mexico if he would.

Having awakened to these two facts, that the Republic still lives, the Union still unbroken, and the military power of the United States such that no Power on the face of the earth can contend with us on this continent, he now avails himself of the eventualities which are arising in Europe, and which he has foreseen, to give those assurances, which are received by this Government, that his troops will certainly be withdrawn from Mexico. I know that, in connection with those assurances, it was given out that the troops of Austria were to be forwarded to Mexico to take the place of the French legions as they should be withdrawn. It has been published in the newspapers in Europe, and republished in this country, that the American Government, by a positive protest to the Austrian Government, has authorized its minister to demand his passports in case a single soldier should be sent from Austria into Mexico; and it is said by the press that the Austrian Government, surrounded as it is by those terrible dangers which threaten the very existence of the Austrian empire, under these circumstances has yielded to our demand, and not a soldier is to be sent to Mexico to take the place of the French; and from all hands, we hear it coming from the city of Mexico, coming from Paris, that the orders are already given for the concentration and the removal of the French troops from Mexico.

Mr. McDUGALL. Allow me to ask the Senator from Wisconsin what is the exact information in that respect. I doubt it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I read yesterday—perhaps the Senator was not in his seat—a letter from a gentleman in the city of Mexico, of high standing and position there, on this subject.

Mr. McDUGALL. I was not informed of that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. A letter from Paris has been read this morning by my honorable friend from New York on the same subject.

Now, Mr. President, I stand as firmly by what is called the Monroe doctrine as the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Kentucky. I believe in that doctrine as it was laid down by the men of that day, and to the extent to which they laid it down. But, sir, I maintain that it is equally clear that we should endeavor to enforce that doctrine and give it efficacy by our moral power, if we can do it, without a resort to arms. First, we should rely on our moral power. It is the best power to be exercised in the management of affairs among nations. It is by far the most humane exercise of power. The war power is only to be called into exercise in the direst contingencies and only in the last resort. If the moral power of our position, a united Republic, regenerated, reinvigorated by the war itself, shall have the effect to make Napoleon withdraw his troops from Mexico without our resorting to arms, how much better will it be for our Republic. If we can avoid war, it is our first and chief duty to avoid it now. We desire no war with any nation on the face of the earth. Peace is our duty and our policy, and it is only in a case of dire necessity that we should draw the sword. We have just passed through a war which has cost us half a million lives and $3,000,000,000, and let us rest upon the stern necessities which we have experienced in that, and not madly rush into another war with France or with England or any other nation unless necessity shall drive it upon us.

Had we at once embarked in war with France I doubt whether we should not have been involved at the same moment in a war with England. France being in Mexico with her troops upon the south; England being upon the north, one flanking us upon the right, the other flanking us upon the left, we might have been involved in war under circumstances that would have occasioned us an immense expenditure of blood and treasure before we reached the end; and it might possibly have involved the very existence of the Republic itself. But if now we can see our way through these complications, if we can see that France is withdrawing her troops from Mexico, and that Austria is declining to send any more legions into Mexico; in short, that Mexico is to be left to herself to work out her own destiny, it is far better for us than to be involved in conflict with France, with England, or with Mexico. Certainly we do not desire the acquisition of Mexico at the present time, if ever. We have territory enough for us to exercise all the powers of statesmanship that we possess to develop, to solidify, and to improve our institutions, and to extend the benefits of peace, prosperity, happiness, and union, and the love of the Union among our own people and throughout our own States.

Mr. President, I hope we shall not allow the views which we may have entertained of France and the proceedings of the Government of France in sending their troops into Mexico—a proceeding which the public judgment of the American people has unqualifiedly condemned—to influence our votes in determining the question pending before the Senate. I hope that we shall look upon this as an industrial exhibition, where industry, the arts of peace, are to be exhibited, and where our people may be permitted to show wherein they have excelled all other nations in their inventions and in the arts of peace.

I agree with the Senator from Kentucky, that the influence which we should exert on this continent should not only be in behalf of Mexico, but in behalf of all the republics of South America. For myself, sir, I would have been entirely satisfied had Commodore Rodgers, on board the Monadnock, taken the responsibility and said to the Spanish fleet that not a shot should be fired upon Valparaiso until he had further orders and further instructions from the Government at home. I would have justified him in that if he had taken the responsibility. But, sir, that is past. I know that the time is pressing upon this Republic when perhaps the old doctrine, as applied to us, of absolute non-intervention in the affairs of other nations, will have to be departed from. The time may come when we shall become so much and so intimately allied with the other nations of the world that we may sometimes be called upon to intervene.

When this doctrine of ours of non-intervention was first declared, we were a feeble people, separated by the ocean from the other civilized Powers of the earth; but the great inventions of modern times, steam and the use of it, both upon the sea and the land, have made us the nearest neighbors of some of the civilized Powers. From the responsibilities of the position in which we are now placed from the fact that we possess this power both physical and moral, from the fact of our intimate relations with the nations of the earth, we may, I say, in the providence of God, have that responsibility thrown upon us when we cannot always say that we will not intervene in the affairs of other nations around us. The time may come when if France unjustly persists in holding Mexico, or Spain unjustly attacks the feeble republics of South America, we may be called upon to intervene, not only by our moral power, but even by arms, to prevent the outrage, in the name of humanity and for the benefit of humanity.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, it is not often that I have so much occasion to differ with my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] but on this subject we differ radically. The Holy Alliance was an effort of which the present movement in Europe is the counterpart. The movement of France in Mexico is a counterpart of the movement upon Valparaiso and Callao. With this matter, perhaps, the Senator from Wisconsin may not be conversant. There is a determination on the part of certain forces in Europe to subjugate Spanish America, and, among other possessions, the State wherein I inhabit. I had occasion to say this in the Senate before. Louis Napoleon, in the opening of the war, pretended that he only wanted to demand a small amount of money, and he invited the United States and Spain and England to join him. They all agreed to do so except our own Government. Our Government refused. The fleets of the three other States came into the Gulf of Mexico; but the English and Spanish fleets withdrew and returned to their own countries. Louis Napoleon wrote to General Forey, who was his commander-in-chief at that time: "My policy is to circumscribe the great republic of North America. They are growing too large and too powerful, and I want to throw a force in that will limit their extension." That was the substance. The letter I read on this floor before. The policy of Louis Napoleon has been one of extreme hostility to the Republic of the United States. The republican sentiment of France is with the United States. He has undertaken to establish an aristocratic sentiment, and for that reason he placed Maximilian, who was related to the iron crown of Charlemagne, in Mexico, making a worse mistake than he who is called his uncle did when he disavowed his true wife and married Marie Therese.

Louis Napoleon is the worst enemy that the republican people of the United States and of the world have, seeking to ally himself by strength with aristocracy. He started as a republican first; he became a Carbonari, known as such throughout Italy; then, not being able to maintain himself as a Carbonari, because his wife, a Spanish woman, was an intense devotee of the Roman church, and as the high bishops and high churchmen of France rebelled he had to change his base; he became then, instead of "new Italy," for "old Italy." Once he supported Victor Emmanuel in order to make a young Italy. Now he dare not lay his word in favor of Venetia.

There are great underlying questions in this very proposition, and the American people have no business to recognize him in any form of power. This amendment is simply declining to recognize him as one of the Powers of Europe with our consent. If we want to compliment our worst enemy, the resolution is well; if we want to ignore our worst enemy, then otherwise. I think, with all the carefulness I can bestow upon the thought, that he is the worst enemy we have and the worst enemy of free institutions. He is a false man. He proved it by turning Carbonari and undertaking to maintain republican institutions when he had no such intention. He went to Paris after he was permitted to return and was elected to a place in the Chambers. He then raised "the Napoleon" cry, which has been a popular cry in France as we all know, and he made a coup d'état; he became first President and then Emperor. His intention from the first was to be Emperor. He hunted up the conclusion in the castle at Ham when he lay there in prison. He is probably the worst man in the world, and certainly the worst enemy of true republican institutions.

Now, I am with the Senator from Iowa. I would like to send some gentlemen to this Exhibition at Paris. I would rather pay them out of my private purse, if I had the money, than pay any compliment to this Emperor. I do hold, and I think that our country should hold, that he is the worst enemy of our country that there is now extant. He has said in his public letters that his policy is to circumscribe this Republic.

Mr. MORRILL. Are you for this amendment?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I say that it would be just as well, by way of observation and by way of commentary and by way of remark, to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, for we have no right to like that man or the Government where he at present obtains authority, but where I say he will not rule two years from now.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] must certainly be amused at the debate that has taken place upon his amendment. That Senator has a great deal of dry humor in him, and he must have enjoyed himself exceedingly during the twenty-four hours of this exhibition.

The industries of the world propose to hold an international Exposition in Paris, the capital of the French nation. Louis Napoleon, of course, is more or less connected with it. The little Prince, we are assured in both Houses, is to preside over it. Now, what is the harm of all that? It is their fashion. What of it? Who in this country cares whether the Emperor's son presides over it, or one of the members of the French Academy?

The skilled men of our country, the inventors, the artisans, the manufacturers, the men at the head of productive industries, desire to be represented, desire to have a part in this Exposition of national industries. They take a deep interest in it; they care something about these material affairs, quite as much as they do about the affairs of our Government. They feel an interest in making an exposition of their skill, their inventions, their industries, as well as in making an exposition to the world of our domestic institutions. I live in a State where we have some inventors, many skilled artisans, and some capital invested in productive industries, and I believe that our people desire to take a part in this Exposition. I do not suppose our countrymen will take the first place in it, although we cannot foresee what will be our position there.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the Senator allow me a word by way of explanation?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The remarks I made were not intended to antagonize the proposition that we should be represented at the Exposition at Paris, but were intended for the person who is chief there. As I am up, let me make another remark, and that is in reference to the protégé of the French Emperor now residing close by us, conterminous with us. What is the rule which is at the foundation of the Monroe doctrine? I should have stated it before, but that I hate to talk long. The rule is laid down by Montesquieu, and it comes from the old Greek, and was well understood by our fathers, that it is the business of great States to protect weak States on the frontier, and we have no business to allow them to be invaded or conquered, for the reason that they are, like great mountains or like seas, barriers between us and our enemies. Hence the Monroe doctrine, which has been one of our underlying laws, was not a mere fancy speculation; it is as old as the ages; and we should have had no question about it if a word had been spoken by the person who had the right to speak, at the opening of this controversy, saying to France, "Trample not upon this ground."

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, we cannot now tell what will be our position if we take part in the international Exposition of the industries of the nations. We have made wonderful progress during the last six years in inventive arts, more than during any equal period of our history. We had a mechanical exhibition in Massachusetts last autumn, and many of the articles on exhibition had been invented or greatly improved during the war, and the improvements there exceeded past years.

Now, sir, our people engaged in those vast and varied industries desire to take part in this Exposition, and they ought to be permitted to do it, and I think the nation ought to give them reasonable encouragement. I shall therefore vote for the joint resolution, and vote against this amendment of the Senator from Iowa, which has brought out a debate that I think has very little relation to the subject before us. I trust it will not be pressed to a vote.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts is doubtless better informed than I am on this subject. I will therefore ask him this question: whether the Governments of Great Britain, Prussia, Russia, Austria, Italy, Spain, and other Governments are contributing money out of the public treasury to assist private persons to transport their goods to Paris for exhibition, and whether the Governments, as such, are in any way connected with this Exhibition? I really put the question for information. I should like to know what the fact is about it.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot give the Senator a positive, direct answer as to how much those Governments are doing.

Mr. HOWARD. Are they doing anything at all?

Mr. WILSON. I cannot say whether they are doing anything or whether they intend to do anything. The leading nations of Europe are within a stone's throw of the place where this Exhibition is to take place, and the inventors and other persons interested in it in western Europe can get to Paris. Situated as we are in this country, across the Atlantic from them, covering a vast territory, I think it is proper that the Federal Government should do something.

A word to the Senator from California, who interrupted me to state his views. We all know what the views of the Senator from California have been in regard to the intervention of France in Mexico. He took the earliest opportunity to discuss that question in the Senate in a speech of rare ability, a speech that I heard then and read immediately after, and I am sure it would be to the advantage of any Senator to read it again and again. I have no doubt that this intervention in Mexican affairs grew out of our weakness; that it was an unfriendly act to us; but the country was in no condition at that time to meet it as it ought to have been met, and the Senator from California was about the only Senator in the body that proposed to meet it, or even to discuss the question.

It is said that the French forces are to go out of Mexico. I believe it, and I believe they go out because of the same ground on which they went in—the condition of this nation. They went in because they thought this nation was lost, that it was a lost Power in the world; and they will take their forces out of Mexico and the Emperor they put there will go out of it at no distant day, because the United States of America lives and is a Power, and a leading Power, in the world.

And now, sir, after we have failed during the last four or five years to take perhaps so bold a part as we ought to have taken, and as the French Emperor now proposes to go out, I do not think anything is to be gained by appearing bold and brave and defiant now. It looks to me like vamping and bragging after the event to do it. That France will be out of Mexico before this Exposition takes place in April next, I have not a doubt; their armies will be out; and that this Emperor imposed upon Mexico will follow before many months I have not a doubt.

This country lives. We are again a united nation—a free nation. Our power is as complete to-day in one State of the Union as in another. France sent her forces to Mexico as an unfriendly act, in our hour of darkness and sorrow. We had unfriendly acts from Great Britain; her colonies even mocked at us. She and they are getting the reward of their baseness now. I have very little sympathy for the fears or quakings of the men over the border, and I would not be very sorrowful if there had been more occasion for fears and quakings than there have been during the last few days.

However, I hope that this amendment will not be pressed upon us. At any rate, if it is I hope that it will be voted down, and that, as we have agreed to do, we will take the part we have proposed in this Exposition, and in doing it I do not think we bow to the French Emperor or any other Emperor, but that we take our part and our lot and make our manifestation in this great exhibition of the industries of the nations. We have a vast country to be developed; we intend to be the first Power of the world in the mechanic arts, in manufactures, and industries, and ere many years pass away I believe we shall be.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, there can be no question, I presume, that what is called the Monroe doctrine is a cherished doctrine with the whole American people; but, sir, there is a time for all things. We may cherish a doctrine, we may believe in its truth, we may intend never to abandon it; but a practical consideration arises, is this the time to act upon it practically? Sir, I think that by the adoption of this amendment we shall present ourselves in rather a ludicrous light to the nations of the earth. With a portion of our own territory, larger than that of Mexico, inhabited by eight or ten million people denied the enjoyment of a republican government, and that by the action of this Congress, denied a voice in the enactment of those laws which are to govern them and their children after them, taxed by the authority of this Government without their consent and without any participation of theirs in the enactment of those taxing laws, it is now proposed that we, the model Republic of the world, thus treating a portion of our own people, holding them in abject submission contrary to the fundamental law of the land, shall say to the Emperor of France, "Walk out of Mexico, for you are violating a cherished doctrine of the American people; you are subverting republican principles in Mexico; and we who are so fondly attached to them cannot patiently wait a little while that you may get out of Mexico." Why, sir, have we a republican government here? Have you had a republican government even in States which adhered to your fortunes during the late struggle, for the last four or five years? Where is your republican government in the State of Maryland? Where is your republican government in the State of Tennessee? Where is your republican government in the State of Missouri to-day? It is that republican government which Louis Napoleon understands so well how to manage. It is that republican government in which elections are controlled by the bayonet. It is that republican government which denies to the people of those States and has denied to the people of those States a voice in the enactment of the laws by which they should be governed. And what is your republican government to-day south of the Potomac, when that people have submitted to the Constitution and the laws, when under the Constitution of the United States they have sent their Senators and Representatives here to participate in your deliberations and to counsel with you in reference to the public good? I ask, sir, again where is your republican government there? There is a territory more extensive than the whole of Mexico, and a people numbering millions who are denied a voice in the Government under which they live, you holding them in abject submission to your authority, and yet proclaiming to the Emperor of France and to all the world that you are so fondly attached to the principles of republican government that you cannot bear to see republican institutions not flourish in the misnamed republic of Mexico. Sir, republican institutions have never flourished there, and if Maximilian were to retire from Mexico to-day, there would be no administration of republican principles there then.

I rose, Mr. President, simply to say that while I accord fully with the Monroe doctrine as understood by Mr. Monroe himself, and as understood by the legislators and statesmen of that day I think that this is no time for us to undertake to practically enforce it. Better, sir, restore republican institutions at home; better open your doors to the Senators and Representatives of the South, and let them participate in your legislation and assist in making the laws by which they and you shall be governed. Give them a voice in the enactment of all the laws which shall conduce to their welfare. Restore fully the statu quo ante bellum. Give us back the Union which our fathers gave us. Give to us the practical enjoyment of the principles of republican government as guaranteed to us and guaranteed to them by the fundamental law of the land. Then, sir, you can proudly in the face of the world proclaim this not only a great but the model Republic, and you can say, in such a manner as will command the respect of the whole civilized world, that these principles which we ourselves enjoy and the enjoyment of which we have secured to every citizen of our own, we intend to see shall be maintained and preserved in Mexico; but until you have done that, until you have restored the whole body of American citizens to the enjoyment of their ancient republican institutions, talk not even to your own people, much less to foreign nations, about preserving republican institutions.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope not. I think there will be no further debate upon this question, and if so we can pass this resolution to-night.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator must see that we cannot come to a vote to-night upon this question. The disposition is to continue to debate it.

Mr. McDUGALL. It will be debated further.

Mr. CONNESS. I insist upon my motion. The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 11, noes 12.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The vote discloses the want of a quorum and we cannot do any further business.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the vote be taken over again; let us have another division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Another division is called for, the last vote showing the want of a quorum. The Chair will put the question again on the motion of the Senator from California that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, the Senate refused to adjourn, there being, on a division—ayes 12, noes 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GRIMES. I offered this amendment in all seriousness for the purpose of bringing out an expression of opinion upon the subject of the relations that subsist between this Government and the Government of France as connected with the occupation of Mexico by the French troops; and I am happy to hear the uniform expression of opinion of condemnation on the part of the representatives of the States here assembled of the course that has been pursued by and the spirit that inspired the Emperor of France in sending his troops into Mexico and attempting to establish a monarchical throne on that soil. Under the assurance that has been given by the Senator from New York, who is the representative of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and who, I suppose, speaks from authority—he has certainly left that impression upon the minds of Senators here present—I propose, with the consent of the Senate, to withdraw the amendment which I moved. I wish to say, however, at the same time, that I am utterly and unalterably opposed to the principle of the bill, and shall vote against it. I believe that there is no true principle upon which it can be based. There is no authority in the Constitution by which we are authorized to make any such grant of money from the Treasury; and I believe that the whole scheme is gotten up for the purpose of aggrandizing the Napoleonic dynasty in France, and is antagonistic to the spirit of republican liberty which should be propagated by the Congress of the United States. With these views I ask leave of the Senate to withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks leave to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The amendment is withdrawn. The question is now on the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as amended.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend that amendment by inserting at the end of the first section of it these words:

Nor shall any member of Congress or any person holding an appointment or office of honor or trust under the United States be appointed a commissioner, agent, or officer under this resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I propose an amendment to come in after line fifteen; it is to add the words "secondly, to provide additional accommodations in the park, $25,000 in coin."

Mr. GRIMES. I inquire if that is for the purpose of erecting a building in Paris.

Mr. HARRIS. It is.

The question was put, and the amendment to the amendment was declared to be rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. It is absolutely necessary, in order to carry out this Exhibition decently on the part of the United States, that this erection should be made. It will be better, far better, for the Government to make some excuse and get out of the thing altogether, than in a niggardly and cheap and mean way to send our exhibitors there for the purpose of making an exhibition and exposing the meanness of our Government before the other nations of the world. If you include this item, it will only make about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the entire expense of it, when other nations, even small nations, have appropriated much more. Belgium, for instance, a country immediately adjoining, has made an appropriation of $120,000 to carry out the expenses of the Exhibition. Every civilized Government in the world, except Denmark, has made appropriations for this purpose.

Mr. GRIMES. To build houses?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, to erect their structures. Every civilized nation in the world, except Denmark, has made appropriations for this purpose.

Mr. COWAN. The Chinese?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, even the Chinese and Japanese. It will be impossible for us to go through with this matter unless we are permitted to build this erection.

Mr. HOWE. Do I understand that each nation builds its own house?

Mr. HARRIS. We have a certain space appropriated in the erection built by the French Government, and then if a nation wants more ground for its exhibition, it is permitted to erect a structure outside, in the park, as it is called. This is for that purpose. I have a letter from our agent on this subject. He says:

"I have received some very pressing dispatches from Commissioner Beckwith, at Paris, urging my second report with catalogue; also stating his surprise and discouragement at the omission of an appropriation for a supplementary building in the park."

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to inquire of the Senator how much space is allotted to us in the building that is erected by the French Government for the Exhibition.

Mr. HARRIS. About thirty thousand square feet, which is, I think, about four acres.

Mr. GRIMES. Four acres allotted to the United States!

Mr. HARRIS. I think so; I may be mistaken. If I compute the acres erroneously others can correct me, but it is thirty thousand square feet.

Mr. COWAN. About three quarters of an acre.

Several SENATORS. Not three quarters of an acre.

Mr. COWAN. My objection to this bill is an exceedingly simple one. At a time when the country is bowed down to the very earth with taxation, when even the poorest laboring man cannot get the necessities of life without paying what formerly would almost have furnished him for a year, I am unwilling to expend money for any such purpose as this, especially when it is not within our province. It is not our duty. We expose our meanness much more by making appropriations for this purpose at all than we should do by making inadequate appropriations. You have no authority to appropriate public money to this purpose, not a particle. You have no more right to give it for this purpose than you have to take it out of the pockets of strangers and appropriate it to me. Nobody pretends to show any authority for it. It is clearly within the province of the States; and if the great State of my honorable friend from New York desires to go to this Exhibition and exhibit her products there, there is nothing in the world to prevent her, and let her make her own appropriation, or let the States combine. But the General Government has no such authority.

Apart from that, even if we had ample authority, who would think of it at this time, burdened as we are, loaded down as we are, and when it requires even a constitutional amendment to satisfy the world in the opinion of some people that we are going to pay the public debt at all?

Mr. WILSON. The men who pay taxes want this done.

Mr. COWAN. The men we are taxing are the men who can pay, and if they desire luxuries of this kind let them pay for them. No one objects to that. I know a gentleman who intends to exhibit at Paris; but he does not ask to do it at the expense of the General Government; he does not ask to do it at the expense of gentlemen who do not intend to exhibit there. He intends to pay his own expenses, and go there with his own commodities and put them up at the World's Fair and let the world see what they are. If New York wants to exhibit there there can be no objection to her doing so; but there is great objection to making California pay for it when she does not want to exhibit there. If Pennsylvania wants to go she is able to go, and she will go, I have no doubt; but why should Florida and why should Alabama, where a hundred thousand people are starving to-day, be taxed for the purpose of sending men from Pennsylvania there to exhibit themselves?

Mr. HENDERSON. We propose to let every exhibitor exhibit his own productions.

Mr. COWAN. Let every exhibitor show his productions; I say so.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is not room enough now.

Mr. COWAN. That is his own lookout. If he cannot get ground on the thirty thousand feet allotted to us, that shows the folly of France in inviting us to such a small space. I do not know that there will be room enough for us all. I do not care about that, however. The progress of the world does not depend on world's fairs and exhibitions of this kind. The progress of the world in arts and sciences and everything else depends upon the wants of the world; and as it discovers its wants its genius will supply them.

I have no objection to the Exhibition, and I have no objection to those who desire to do so engaging in it; but let them pay for it. What I object to is, that the people should be taxed to pay for this, and that the people should be taxed under these circumstances. I beg gentlemen to remember that our finances are not in such a condition that we can afford to run out into expenditures of this kind. If there is any cry that comes up from the country that is more to be heeded than any other, it is the cry for retrenchment and reform and saving in all these things. There was a time when the nation cared but little about such an expenditure as this; but now, when it behooves us to save every dollar, when our credit is at stake, and when the slightest jostle, the slightest panic, the least difficulty may cause us intolerable suffering and wrong—I say that under such circumstances, I look upon this as wholly imprudent, and I protest against it in the name and in behalf of those who pay the taxes wrung out of them under adverse circumstances everywhere all over the country. It is well enough for rich people, well enough for those who have heretofore accumulated their hundreds of thousands and their millions to go to world's fairs and shows of this kind; but if they do, let them pay. There is no reason why the laboring men, the poor and the toiling whom we tax everywhere and tax upon almost everything, even the prime necessities of life, should be made to pay for this.

I have nothing to say about the Monroe doctrine, nothing to say about the conduct of France toward the people of the United States during the late struggle, nothing to say about the Emperor, nothing to say about his son. France is an independent realm of the earth, and if she chooses to be ruled by Napoleon, I have no objection, none in the world; and if she chooses to consecrate the young Comte de Paris as successor to Napoleon III, that is her right and her privilege. If a republican Government is better than the one she has now adopted I have no doubt whenever she is ready for it she will find it out. I have no sympathy, either, for republican Mexico, so called, I must confess. For the last thirty years of my life, I think, I have been a student of the history of Mexico, and I believe that in that time she has had at least forty different Governments.

A SENATOR. Thirty-seven.

Mr. COWAN. It may be only thirty-seven; and if so, I beg the pardon of Mexico for surcharging her with three. To talk about a republican Government in Mexico, I think is only to make republicanism utterly absurd and ridiculous. There never was such a thing there, and it is utterly impossible. If I were to view it as a question of dollars and cents, I think the United States ought to be very much obliged to anybody who would introduce into Mexico law and order and good government, because if it were introduced there for a period of fifteen or twenty years I have no doubt that the United States would reap the largest advantages from it of any people upon the earth. Then, instead of selling to Mexico a mere pittance as at present—I do not know what it amounts to, perhaps half a million annually—

I have no doubt we could sell to that people of our products perhaps two or three hundred millions.

Are we in danger from the establishment of an empire there? Mr. President, I have no doubt that we could settle our difficulties many a time by removing out of the way any such obstacles as that; and I should think that an empire in Mexico, placed there as a foil for the United States, would be one of the most wholesome things in the world. If we ever differed among ourselves, we should heal all our differences by going down and removing the empire and establishing another Government instead. I have no fear of the establishment of an empire in Mexico. Thank God, it never will be in the road of the United States. This Republic will never find it an obstacle to its progress. What the people of Mexico want now is a reign of law, order, peace, where the industrious man can earn something, and, when he earns it, keep it. I believe there is not a very strong desire for effective accumulation among their people, but that might be cultivated and rise to an extent which would make the people prosperous and happy. As she has been for the last twenty-five or thirty years in the hands of desperate politicians, revolutionists, brigands of every kind, her progress has been directly backward, if there be such a thing.

But apart from all the relations that exist between us and France and Mexico, I am opposed to the expenditure of money, now, for this purpose, because I believe that it behooves us everywhere, one and all, to curtail our expenditures and retrench our outlay until we are absolutely certain that with a reasonable pressure upon our people we can extract taxes enough from them to keep the public credit unstained as we have kept the public patriotism and its credit and fidelity free from reproach.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, this Exhibition is in one respect a novelty; it is unlike any Exhibition of the kind that has ever been held before. It is national in its character. The State of New York cannot go there and exhibit its products, nor any other State, nor can individuals do so. The producers, the inventors, the mechanics, the artisans of the country can only make their exhibitions through their Government; and now if the Government is to do anything it will cost some money. We must do one of two things; we must either back out altogether, abandon the thing, pay the expenses that have been incurred, and make some excuse to the French Government and to the world why we refuse to appear at the Exhibition, having in January last accepted the invitation, or else we must do the thing well. We cannot afford to do anything else than either back out altogether or make the necessary expenditure to do the thing well and creditably. To accomplish this will take some money, and this appropriation is undoubtedly necessary, it is indispensable, and if the Senate do not choose to make the appropriation they had better defeat the bill altogether and then make the best excuse we can and back out of the whole thing.

We did resolve in January last that we would accept the invitation. We have gone on and appointed our officers; we have invited the producers, mechanics, artisans, and inventors of the country to make their offerings, and we have now offered for exhibition vastly more than all the room we can provide will accommodate. If the Senate do not choose to make this appropriation for the purpose of providing the necessary room, then let us abandon the thing altogether.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The statement of the Senator from New York has taken me by surprise. He informs us that no citizen, not even one of the—

Mr. GRIMES. I think we had better adjourn. We cannot hear the Senator from Indiana.

[A violent thunder storm was raging, the rain pattered noisily on the roof, and the obscuration of the sky darkened the Chamber.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not want to speak long.

Mr. GRIMES. We are all anxious to hear the Senator, but we cannot hear a word in the storm now going on. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 14, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BRITISH AMERICAN TRADE.

The SPEAKER. At the adjournment last evening, Senate bill No. 850, to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to pay those employed as examiners and assistant examiners the salary fixed by law for the duties performed by them, was before the House, on which a motion was pending for the previous question, and also a motion that the bill be laid upon the table; pending which the Chair, by unanimous consent, laid before the House certain executive communications. The last of these was a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a resolution of the House calling for information in regard to commercial relations with British America. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] objected to the printing of that communication, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WESTWORTH] demanded that the communication should be read. As there has been no vote upon the question, the Chair withdraws the communication, and it will lie upon the table until, by a vote of the House, business on the Speaker's table shall be reached.

Mr. WESTWORTH. With the consent of the House I will state my object in calling for the reading of that document. I was afraid that my friend from New York had been up to the Speaker's table and had seen what was in the communication, while I had not seen its contents. I withdraw my call for the reading of the communication.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to say that I am very sorry the gentleman from Illinois should suppose that I knew more than he did. [Laughter.] My objection to the printing of the communication was based upon information which I had received that it contained no new intelligence. I have learned, however, that I was misinformed; and I withdraw my objection to the printing of the document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdraws his objection to the printing of the communication; and if there be no further objection it will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection.

BUREAU OF INSURANCE.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, introduced, by unanimous consent, a bill for the creation of a national Bureau of Insurance, and to provide for funding the indebtedness of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back House bill No. 361, to reorganize and establish the Army of the United States, with an amendment in the form of a substitute. I move that the substitute be ordered to be printed, and that the bill and substitute be recommended.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now desire that, by the consent of the House, some time be fixed when the committee may report and the bill be acted upon by the House. I will name tomorrow after the morning hour, if that will suit gentlemen of the House.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent to fix to-morrow for the consideration of this bill, because the reconstruction bill has precedence.

Mr. DAVIS. I would like to make a suggestion. This substitute which is now ordered to be printed will not be upon our files before to-morrow morning, and if we should at that time proceed to its consideration, we shall have had no time to examine it in advance. It seems to me that it should not be taken up before the early part of next week.

Mr. SCHENCK. There will probably be so many questions raised in reference to the bill itself that I do not wish to raise any question in advance. I therefore move that the bill be made the special order for Tuesday of next week, immediately after the morning hour. The motion was agreed to.

CORPUS CHRISTI COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to create the collection district of Corpus Christi, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CALIFORNIA LAND TITLES.

Mr. BIDWELL had entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 343, to quiet land titles in California, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXAMINERS OF PATENTS.

The regular order of business was Senate bill No. 330, to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to pay those employed as examiners and assistant examiners the salary fixed by law for the duties performed by them, which Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, had moved to lay upon the table.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask the Clerk to read the papers I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 22, 1866.

SIR: Having been informed of the loss of a letter I had the honor, as Commissioner of Patents, to address to you a year ago, in relation to the compensation of persons employed in the Patent Office as examiners and assistant examiners of patents, and having been requested to again communicate the substance of that letter to you, it gives me pleasure to do so, especially as I regard the measure sought to be accomplished as warranted by the strictest justice and sanctioned by the most approved precedents.

The number of applications for patents in any given period can never be foretold. Were the number of examiners and assistant examiners in commission at any time found to be too great, the occasional reduction of such force, and even apprehensions of such reduction, it has always been believed, would be attended with depressing and injurious influences. The policy pursued has therefore been, for many years, to limit the number in commission to the probable minimum required for the service, and to meet the requirements beyond this standard by detailing examiners of the lower grades for the discharge of duties appropriate to the higher, and members of the clerical force to fill the positions thus made vacant.

This practice received the sanction of Congress in 1856, when, in the law approved August 18, it was enacted that "the Commissioner of Patents is hereby authorized to pay those employed in the United States Patent Office, from April 1, 1854, until April 1, 1855, as examiners and assistant examiners of patents, at the rates fixed by law for these respective grades: Provided, That the same be paid out of the Patent Office fund, and that the compensation thus paid shall not exceed that received by those duly enrolled as examiners and assistant examiners of patents for the same period;" and again in 1860, when in the law approved June 25, it was enacted that "the Commissioner of Patents is hereby authorized to pay those employed in the Patent Office from April 1, 1855, until April 1, 1860, as examiners and assistant examiners of patents, at the rates fixed by law for these respective grades: Provided, That the same be paid out of the Patent Office fund, and that the compensation thus paid shall not exceed that received by those duly enrolled as examiners and assistant examiners of patents for the same period."

If an argument were needed to enforce the appeal which I understand is now made for authority to compensate these officers for the services they have rendered, it appears to me that it is afforded in the words of the twice-enacted statute I have quoted, namely, "that the same be paid out of the Patent Office fund;" that is to say, the officers are to receive compensation out of the revenue derived by means of the services they have rendered in positions above their respective commissions. I may add, however, and with great propriety, that a large portion of these claims arose in the manner recited, and from the necessity of the case, during my official term as Commissioner, and that it was always my purpose to ask Congress for authority to discharge them in the manner herein recommended.

I have the honor to be yours very respectfully,
D. P. HOLLOWAY.

Hon. THOMAS A. JENCKES,
Chairman Committee on Patents.

SIR: At the last session of Congress my predecessor, Hon. D. P. Holloway, addressed to your committee a letter requesting that he might be authorized to pay to those employed as examiners and assistant examiners the rates fixed by law for the duties performed by them. I am informed that he has recently renewed that request.

Agreeing with him that the parties referred to are justly entitled to the pay, they having performed the duties faithfully and fully, with the promise and expectation that they would be thus paid, I hereby respectfully request that the desired authority be given to the Commissioner to pay them the amounts due, to the funds of the Patent Office now being in such a condition as, in my opinion, to justify such action. In this connection I desire to say to the committee that I do not wish this request to be construed as a precedent to bind me to a similar recommendation in any future case of the kind, as, in making appointments in my bureau, I have taken pains to have all understand that they are not hereafter to expect any increase of pay over that belonging to the position to which they are appointed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
T. C. THEAKER,
Commissioner.

Hon. THOMAS A. JENCKES,
Chairman Committee on Patents.

SIR: The undersigned, a committee acting on behalf of the examiners and assistant examiners employed in the Patent Office during the past four years, beg leave most respectfully to call the attention of your committee to the following facts in support of the request made by Hon. D. P. Holloway, Commissioner of Patents, at the last session of Congress, and now renewed by Hon. T. C. Theaker, the present Commissioner.

Soon after the breaking out of the rebellion, the funds of the Patent Office became so reduced by the derangement of business all over the country that the then Commissioner, in order to comply with the requirements of the law making the Patent Office a self-sustaining bureau, felt himself obliged to reduce the salaries of the examiners and assistant examiners below the amounts fixed by law. In doing this, he assured us that it was but a temporary expedient, forced upon him by the unusual circumstances of the case; and that, if we would remain and continue to perform our respective duties as before, the amount of our salaries, as fixed by law, should be made up to us so soon as the funds of the bureau would justify or permit its being done.

With this assurance of the head of the bureau, and with the precedent of similar action on the part of Congress on two former occasions, we did remain and perform our duties faithfully and fully; working more hours and performing much more labor than was ever before performed in the bureau.

In order that you may see and understand exactly what we did, and how valuable were the services we rendered, we beg to call your attention to the following comparison of the labor performed by us during those four years with that of the preceding eight years as shown by the office records.

During the prior eight years from 1853 to 1860, both inclusive, there were employed as examiners and assistants thirty-four men; from 1860 to 1865, there were twenty-two men, being less than two thirds of the force. Number of cases examined from 1852 to 1860, the annual average per man, one hundred and forty-two; from 1860 to 1865, the annual average per man, two hundred and forty; showing an increase in the number of cases examined of eighty-two per cent. But in order to appreciate fully the actual increase of labor performed, your committee should bear in mind the fact that the labor of examining a case is constantly increasing with every case filed, as every case filed makes one more to be looked over in the examination of future cases; and thus, in reality, the increase of labor performed by us was fully one hundred per cent.

Taking the amount of fees received for patents issued as the basis of the calculation, and the difference is still greater. The average amount per man, of fees received on patents issued during the preceding eight years, was $2,282. Ditto, during the past four years, $5,236, showing an increase of one hundred and twenty-nine per cent.

Not only was this greatly increased amount of labor performed and money earned by us, but it was done on reduced salaries, and at a time when the cost of living was double what it was during the previous period referred to. Nor is this all; in common with other employees, our salaries were still further reduced by the Government tax, which we were not, like citizens not in the employ of the Government, permitted to deduct our house rents from the amount subject to taxation. Not only were we, like others, subject to military service and to draft, but some of our number furnished voluntary substitutes, when not actually liable to draft, while others gave of their households to the service of the country, no less than two out of one family sacrificing their lives in the service, one in the Army, and the other in the Navy.

In view of these facts, your petitioners respectfully ask your committee to present for the action of Congress the necessary resolution or bill authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to pay us, out of the surplus funds of the bureau, the amounts respectively due us for the services rendered.

On two former occasions, to wit, by the act approved May 14, 1856, and the act approved June 25, 1860,

Congress did this same thing. It was done for men whose salaries had not been reduced as ours have; who performed not one half as much service as we have; who received their salary in gold and paid no Government tax on it; who were not called upon to furnish substitutes, either voluntary or otherwise, for the military service; and at a time when the cost of living here was not more than half its present rates. If such action was just and right then, in their case, how much more so is it now, in our case!

In conclusion, we beg to remind your committee that we are not asking for any appropriation of money from the Treasury, but simply that you authorize the Commissioner to pay us the amount fixed by law as our salary out of the surplus Patent Office fund, which surplus has been created by the extraordinary amount of service performed by us. We have honestly and faithfully earned it; it is our just due, and we and our families need it. There is now a large surplus fund on hand, and there is no reason why we should not be paid.

In a matter so plain further argument seems unnecessary, and we submit the subject for your consideration, hopefully trusting that you will afford us speedy relief in the manner asked.

We present herewith copies of the acts referred to:

"SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Patents is hereby authorized to pay those employed in the United States Patent Office from April 1, 1854, until April 1, 1855, as examiners and assistant examiners of patents, at the rates fixed by law for these respective grades: Provided, That the same be paid out of the Patent Office fund, and that the compensation thus paid shall not exceed that received by those duly enrolled as examiners and assistant examiners of patents for the same period."

—May 14, 1856.

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Patents is hereby authorized to pay those employed in the Patent Office from April 1, 1855, until April 1, 1860, as examiners and assistant examiners of patents, at the rates fixed by law for these respective grades: Provided, That the same be paid out of the Patent Office fund, and that the compensation thus paid shall not exceed that received by those duly enrolled as examiners and assistant examiners of patents for the same period."

—June 25, 1860.
J. M. BLANCHARD,
L. J. FARWELL,
W. C. DODGE.

To Hon. T. A. JENCKES, Chairman of Committee on Patents, House of Representatives.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table; and while I am up I will say a few words.

Mr. Speaker, when this bill was before the House a few days since for consideration, I thought then, and I think so still, that it involved a new principle. I understand it to be relatively like a proposition to pay an officer of a lower grade in the Army the compensation belonging to an officer of a higher grade when an officer of a lower grade performed the duties of the higher position. It is like an orderly sergeant, on the ground of having performed the duties of captain on many battle-fields, asking for compensation as captain. The principle is precisely the same.

In this case we have an application from the officers of the Interior Department to give them, in addition to their salary since 1861, which has been regularly paid to them, the further sum of $700 per year, if I calculate correctly, because there were times when they were compelled to perform duties which devolved upon officers of a higher grade. I object, because I believe it is a departure from former practice. These men were employed by the Government, and say that they have received their pay regularly. In 1863 the patent fund was found to be insufficient. Congress passed a law that when the patent fund was realized the Commissioner should pay them. They all say they have received their salary from 1861, according to their commissions, but inasmuch as heretofore some other officers have received something additional we are asked to grant these parties additional compensation.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, an answer to the objection of the gentleman from Illinois may be made briefly and conclusively. Laws passed previously to 1861 authorized the Commissioner of Patents to pay assistant examiners for doing the duty of chief examiners. These assistant examiners were requested to perform the duties of a higher grade on expectation they would be paid additional for the performance of these duties.

This is not an appropriation from the Treasury. These men have earned every dollar they ask for. They earned it at the request of the chief of the bureau, and the chief of the bureau asks Congress to enable him to give satisfaction to these men. It is only a measure of public justice, and the bill should pass.

Mr. THAYER. I would ask the gentleman from Rhode Island what amount of money will be expended in this way.

Mr. JENCKES. This comes from the Patent Office fund and not from the Treasury; it comes from the fees that are paid to the Patent Office.

Mr. THAYER. How much will probably be expended?

Mr. JENCKES. I am not able to state the precise amount; it will be no great sum. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I understand this pay goes back to 1861.

Mr. JENCKES. Yes, sir; but a previous law covered the period up to 1861, and this is for the period since.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I object to the gentleman getting a bankrupt law through this House, and then introducing bills which will bankrupt the Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. JENCKES. This proposes only to pay wages for fair days' work. These gentlemen have earned their pay and ought to have it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask for the reading of the bill. It goes back to 1861.

The bill was read.

Mr. JENCKES. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] I will state that application was made for this pay at the earliest time it could be done, and during the last Congress a bill passed the Senate and was lost in the House.

I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I do not think the House understand it; the bill proposes to pay back salaries.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to ask whether these parties whom it is now proposed to pay under this bill have not been employed before 1861, and have not since that time received compensation.

Mr. JENCKES. They have received compensation only for the subordinate grades since 1861. Down to 1861 they were paid for all the extra duty they performed. This bill proposes to pay them for that extra service since 1861.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Does the gentleman say that these gentlemen did not get the pay to which they were entitled by law?

Mr. JENCKES. No, sir; I mean to say just the opposite.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. That is, they have received their full pay for the office to which they have been appointed.

Mr. JENCKES. Yes, sir; but they have been required to perform duties of another grade, for which they have not been paid.

Mr. WENTWORTH. The question is, whether these men who have been receiving fixed salaries shall be paid for what they have done out of office.

Mr. JENCKES. It makes no difference whether they were in or out of office.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 67, nays 41, not voting 75; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Cofroth, Cullem, Darling, Demison, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eliot, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Wright—75.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. JENCKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) relative to appointments to the Military Academy of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

CREDENTIALS—NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. WHALEY, by unanimous consent, presented the credentials of Lewis Hanes, claiming to be a Representative from the fifth congressional district of North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The credentials will be referred, under the concurrent resolution, to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I make the point of order that the committee has made its final report, and that no business can be referred to it now.

The SPEAKER. A variety of credentials have been referred to the committee on which they have not yet reported.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order of business.

ASSAY OFFICES.

The House resumed, as the regular order of business, the consideration of bill of the House No. 674, to establish additional offices for the assay of gold and silver, and for other purposes, reported yesterday from the Committee on Appropriations, on which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all in the body of the bill relating to the State of Oregon, and add the following as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That section one of an act entitled "An act to establish a branch mint of the United States at Dallas City, in the State of Oregon," approved July 4, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to locate and establish said branch mint at the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, instead of at Dallas City, and that the appropriation for the erection of the necessary buildings, fixtures, &c., for said branch mint be, and the same is hereby, continued, and shall be applicable to the purposes and provisions of this act.

Mr. ALLISON. I will now yield for five minutes to the gentlemen from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I should not have desired, perhaps, to speak on this question at all but for the allusion of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HENDERSON] to the Committee of Ways and Means, and I beg to assure the gentleman that his presence before the Committee of Ways and Means produced far more effect than his argument, for the committee I know feel very kindly disposed toward the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. Speaker, the object of the Committee of Ways and Means is to establish a policy in relation to these mints, and the policy believed by them to be most proper is to have one mint on the Pacific coast and one upon the Atlantic coast. More than these we do not believe to be wise or sound economy to establish. If the State of Oregon can claim a mint so may every other Territory and every other State where they produce gold or silver. My own State would be exceedingly gratified to have a mint, for we produce some gold, even in Vermont, not in as large quantities as they do in Oregon, but still the further fact exists in relation to Vermont that our produce of gold is increasing while that of Oregon, I believe, is decreasing. The amount produced in Oregon is certainly less than that produced in other States or Territories which are yet without mints. Other nations, I believe, usually have but one mint. Instead of increasing the number we now have, I think it might be better to change some we have into assay offices, which, except for the purposes of annual local expenditure, answer all the practical wants of the people actually engaged in mining.

If we are to establish a mint wherever the people want one, and because they know they want one, we shall have to revise the internal revenue bill for the purpose of providing a more ample amount of revenue to cover the expense.

Mr. Speaker, the difficulty of having half a dozen different mints that will present a coinage of identically the same value is obviously very great. The risk in relation to obtaining competent officers, and skilled workmen and of guarding against fraud is also very great. Coin is now like bullion, merely an article of merchandise. It is not used even by the miners as money, but it is sold for the most it will bring. It is immediately shipped away, and it may as well be shipped away in bullion as in coin. It is a waste of labor, time, and expense to coin it. The miners cannot hold it, and do not want to hold it. Neither can our country hold it. When it reaches New York it will at once start on its journey to Europe. It is one of our largest articles among exports.

I trust the House will come to the conclusion that it is just and right not to involve the country in a policy that shall demand the establishment of a mint in every State or Territory where gold or silver may be produced; and if we are to have a national policy for the accommodation of the whole country, and not one merely for the dispensation of local patronage wherever it may be zealously sought after, we shall reject the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon, (and on his account I regret to urge this,) and then accept the bill as reported by the gentleman from Iowa from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not suppose that it is necessary for me to add anything to the remarks made by the chairman of the committee on this question of establishing an assay office, as provided in this bill.

I fully appreciate the anxiety of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HENDERSON] to preserve the appropriation made by Congress two years ago for the establishment of a mint in that State. But upon examination of this subject by the Committee of Ways and Means, and a reference to the petitions that have been presented to us during the present session, we have become satisfied that if we once establish the principle of locating branch mints in every Territory or State where gold is found we will have branch mints all over the country. The experience of the country in this regard shows that it is only necessary to have one mint in the Atlantic States and one mint upon the Pacific coast.

The first mint established by this Government was in the year 1800, at the then capital of the nation, the city of Philadelphia. The act authorizing the Mint at that city was renewed from year to year, until in 1831, I believe, the Mint was finally established in that city.

Some years afterward, gold having been discovered in Georgia and North Carolina, there was a pressure from those States upon Congress in those years to establish branch mints in those two States. Congress yielded to that pressure and established one mint in Georgia and another in North Carolina during the session of 1836-37, and those mints were in operation from the time of their establishment down to the outbreak of the rebellion. Yet the mint in Georgia, during that entire period of time, some twenty-three years, coined only about six million dollars; and the mint in North Carolina during the same time coined a less sum. The committee believe that those mints are now no longer necessary, and they propose to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of them, and establish assay offices in their stead, if he deems it expedient to do so.

A pressure was made upon Congress at that time to establish also a branch mint in the city of New Orleans, upon commercial grounds, because it took so much time to transfer gold and silver from that city to the great centers of commerce, New York and Philadelphia. A branch mint was established there also by the same act authorizing mints in Georgia and North Carolina, but of the whole amount of gold coined at New Orleans, about twenty-two million dollars came from California after the discovery of gold in that region.

By reference to the report of the Superintendent of the Mint in Philadelphia, it will be seen that notwithstanding we have a branch mint to-day at the city of Denver, in the Territory of Colorado, during the year 1865, of the amount of bullion transferred to the various mints and assay offices, but $380,000 went to the Mint in Philadelphia, but $375,000 went to the mint in Denver, and $938,000, or nearly a million dollars, went to the assay office in the city of New York for the purpose of being melted and assayed. It is a fact that gold dust has passed by the mints of Denver and San Francisco to New York. In confirmation of what I say, I call attention to the following extract from Mr. Bowles's interesting book, Across the Continent, in which, among other things, he treats of this subject of the Mint and its branches, and says, speaking of the branch mint at San Francisco:

"Of all the Government institutions in San Francisco, the mint is the most interesting and important. Already it is the great manufactory of coin in the nation, and its comparative importance in that respect is destined to increase. It coins now about twenty millions of gold and silver a year, against five millions coined at all the other Government mints in the country, including the parent Mint at Philadelphia. The coinage here for June and July was nearly three millions a month, and the aggregate for this year is likely to go up to twenty-four millions. Mints elsewhere on the Pacific coast, and in the mining regions, are utterly unnecessary. There is one at Denver, in Colorado, but it has nothing to do—the gold of the Colorado and Montana mines goes right by it, in dust and bars, to New York and Philadelphia. Efforts are making to get mints in Nevada and in Oregon, but they would only prove a waste of money. No local clamor of politicians, seeking home popularity or contractors' jobs for friends, should induce Congress to yield to such demands. Two mints are only needed for the whole country, at New York or Philadelphia, and at San Francisco. The metals, as soon as mined, drift at once to the commercial and financial centers; there only can their true value be known; there only the use to which commerce may choose to put them."

Mr. Speaker, the statement of the writer of that book is confirmed by the report of the Superintendent of the Mint at Philadelphia. This officer, in his annual report of 1864, deprecates the establishment of any more branch mints in this country, and he says, as the Committee of Ways and Means believe truthfully, that assay offices will accomplish all that is required in these new regions for the purpose of developing their mineral interests. He says:

"Neither public nor private interests, national or local considerations, require the multiplication of branch mints for coinage. When located far from our great commercial centers, the difficulties and expense necessarily attending their operations greatly outweigh every advantage that can be derived from their establishment. The mints now in operation are sufficient for the coinage of all the gold and silver that can be produced in the United States. San Francisco is the commercial and economical point for the coinage of the precious metals produced from the mines of the States and Territories west of the Rocky mountains. The parent Mint in Philadelphia occupies the same position in reference to the Atlantic States. These two great central institutions, in their capacity for coinage, can abundantly meet any governmental or commercial demand. These for coinage, and the establishment of assay offices by the Government in our mining regions for melting, refining, assaying, and stamping bullion, will secure to the mining interests of the country every facility that can be desired and every encouragement that can with propriety be expected."

I sympathize fully with the gentleman from Oregon in his desire to secure the development of his section of country. The Committee of Ways and Means would gladly have consented to the establishment of this mint at Portland, Oregon, if by that means the object which he seeks could be accomplished. We desire as much as he can desire the development of that region. But in this bill we have provided virtually for all that could be accomplished by the establishment of a branch mint. We have provided that the superintendents of the assay offices at Portland, and at Boise City, shall have authority to issue certificates for the net value of the bullion deposited in those offices; and those certificates are to be payable either at the branch mint at San Francisco or at the principal Mint in the city of Philadelphia. This, I submit, will accomplish all that the gentleman from Oregon desires. The gentleman informs us that there is a line of steamers running three times every month between Portland, Oregon, and San Francisco. Hence this bullion can be transported to San Francisco at very little expense. Thus by a system of purchases and exchanges as provided for in this bill, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Government will assume the risk of transporting bullion from the assay offices to the mints for coinage, or to the commercial centers for sale. This system will not only benefit the hardy miner in the gold regions, but also the general commercial interests of the country, and will save to the Government a large annual expenditure which would necessarily be incurred if branch mints are to be established in all the gold-bearing States and Territories of the Union.

Sir, these mints are very expensive affairs. The parent Mint, at Philadelphia, costs from $75,000 to $150,000 annually to the Government; and the annual expense of maintaining the mint at San Francisco is about one hundred and forty thousand dollars. The cost of building a suitable mint at Portland, Oregon, would be from $150,000 to $200,000, and a large annual expenditure must be incurred to sustain it when established. Besides, sir, it is important that in our mints we should have the most experienced and best mechanical skill and labor and the best machinery that can be procured for the purpose of coining the money of the country. And it cannot be expected that in every gold-bearing region this expensive machinery and this skilled and experienced mechanical labor can be procured.

The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended the Committee of Ways and Means to go beyond what they have proposed to the House by this bill. It will be remembered that there is a branch mint now authorized at Carson City, in the State of Nevada, as well as a branch mint at Denver, in the Territory of Colorado. The Secretary of the Treasury, concurring with the superintendent of the assay office at New York, recommends that he be authorized to convert these branch mints into assay offices, believing that in this way will be accomplished all that is necessary for the coining of money in those distant regions. The Secretary of the Treasury says, in a recent letter to the Senate Finance Committee:

"I concur in the opinion of the superintendent of the assay office, expressed in his report, that no more branch mints should be established; and I should be glad to have a section incorporated in this bill converting all existing branch mints, with the exception of the branches at San Francisco and New Orleans, into assay offices."

Now, the truth is that money will seek the business centers, and those centers are to-day

New York and Philadelphia. When we have the Pacific railroad to San Francisco; that city will be the great exchanging commercial center for all the trade between Europe and America and Asia, and will be the center of business for the Pacific coast and all the regions west of the Rocky mountains.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it perfectly apparent that, as has been urged by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, we should have a fixed policy on this subject. If we establish a mint at Portland, Oregon, we must establish one at Boise City, in the Territory of Idaho, because Idaho to-day produces twice or thrice the amount of gold that is produced in the State of Oregon. The Territory of Montana is a rich gold-bearing region, and will demand that she also shall have a mint for the purpose of coining the gold produced in her mines. The policy of the Government, as recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the chief officer of the Mint at Philadelphia, is that we shall have two great mints in this country, one on the Pacific coast and one upon the Atlantic coast; and that, where ever convenience requires, there shall be assay offices, from which the bullion may be transferred to the mints for coinage. And in this policy I hope the House will concur.

I demand the previous question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry my arguments did not have a favorable influence upon the mind of the chairman of the committee; and I alluded to the fact that I was only allowed one half minute before the committee in which to explain this whole question, not because I wished to find fault with the committee, but to induce them to extend my time here.

I must say the chairman of the committee is much mistaken when he says that the production of gold is decreasing in Oregon; new mines are being discovered and developed almost every day.

The gentleman from Iowa has read the opinion of the Superintendent of the Mint at Philadelphia to show that we do not need a branch mint in Oregon. Now, sir, I doubt seriously whether he could tell, without looking upon a map, whether Oregon lies north or south of the Columbia river. He has not taken the pains to inform himself. Again, it is very natural that he should oppose the establishment of branch mints in other sections of the country.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman from Oregon allow me a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will, sir.

Mr. THAYER. Does the gentleman suppose that the Superintendent of the Mint at Philadelphia would derive any advantage from the non-establishment of mints in other parts of the country, or that his opinions are influenced by such considerations?

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that if branch mints should be established in other sections they will reduce the business of his, and the necessity for it may ultimately cease. And as to whether he can be affected by corrupt motives, I suppose he is no better than other people—inclined to look out for his own interest. I now ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he wishes to get clear of the Mint at Philadelphia.

Mr. THAYER. By no means. The necessity for it is too apparent, and will not be likely to cease. Philadelphia is a great commercial center.

Mr. HENDERSON. So is Portland, in Oregon; it sustains the same relation to the valley of the Columbia that New Orleans does to the valley of the Mississippi; it is the commercial center for the whole valley of that magnificent river.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Speaker, I will add but one word to what I have already said.

The policy of establishing branch mints all over the country cannot safely longer be pursued. The British empire, with all its possessions and the amount of gold it coins annually, has but one mint for that purpose. I believe it would be better for us if we had but one;

and if it were an original question, I would not go for more than one to coin all the money for the country.

I do not believe, sir, the Mint will ever be removed from Philadelphia. It is a great commercial center, and the machinery and material we have there could not elsewhere be procured at a like cost.

I move to add the following to the second section:

Provided, That such salaries and compensation shall not exceed that allowed for corresponding service under existing laws relating to the Mint of the United States and its branches.

I demand the previous question.

Mr. McRUER. I would like to amend on page 4, line twenty, by inserting the words "by the Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer of the United States;" so that these certificates may be paid at the Treasury or by Assistant Treasurers.

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot yield for that purpose. We provide they shall be paid at the Mint at Philadelphia and at the branch mint at San Francisco, and I think that is ample.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ALLISON's amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. HENDERSON's amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 41, nays 73, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baker, Banks, Barker, Bidwell, Blaine, Cobb, Cullom, Darling, DeFrance, Dodge, Briggs, Dumont, Farquhar, Harris, Henderson, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Kelso, Ketchum, Kuykendall, Latham, Loan, Lynch, McClure, McKee, Moulton, Nowell, Orth, Paine, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Sloan, Francis Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Windom, and Woodbridge—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Aneona, Baldwin, Beaman, Bergen, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Brown, Buckland, Bundy, Coffroth, Cook, Davis, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Holmes, Edwin N. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Jenckes, Kelley, Laffin, Le Blond, Longyear, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McKuer, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Perham, Plants, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Stevens, Strouse, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, William D. Washburn, Whaley, and Winfield—73.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baxter, Benjamin, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Culver, Dawes, Dunning, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Ferry, Goodyear, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Dennis Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kussow, Kerr, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Marston, McIndoo, Noell, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Rogers, Rollins, Rousseau, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Taber, Van Aernum, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wright—67.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to correct an error made by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Allison.] He said that the expenditure for the United States Mint at Philadelphia was $75,000 per annum. I do not wish to hear the extent of the business of that Mint depreciated. It is a very extensive institution, and is well conducted, and the appropriation for the Mint during the coming year is over $160,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR. I ask the gentleman if there is not a mint already established in San Francisco.

Mr. ALLISON. There is; but this is for an assay office only.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, with leave to report at any time after the morning hour.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I rise to a personal explanation. I was not well enough to be in my seat yesterday when the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution was acted upon. Had I been able to be here I would have voted in favor of the resolution.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. JULIAN, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 85, for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 85) for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, having met, have, after full and free conference, agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to the respective Houses as follows:

1. That the Senate recede from the first amendment of the Senate, striking out on page 1 all after the words "sixty-four" in line eight to the word "and" in line twelve, and that the words thus restored be amended by inserting on page 1, line eight, after the word "that" the words "until the expiration of two years from and after the passage of this act."

2. That the Senate recede from the second amendment of the Senate.

3. That the House agree to the third amendment of the Senate with an amendment, as follows: that at the end of the second section of the bill, as the same passed the Senate, shall be added the following proviso: "Provided, That until the 1st day of January, 1867, any person applying for the benefit of this act, shall in addition to the oath hereinbefore required, also make oath that he has not borne arms against the United States or given aid and comfort to its enemies."

S. J. KIRK WOOD,

HENRY WILSON,

GARRETT DAVIS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

GEORGE W. JULIAN,

JOHN H. RICE,

S. E. ANCONA,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BERKELEY AND JEFFERSON COUNTIES.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to report back, from the Committee on the Judiciary, House joint resolution No. 120, to extend to the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, of West Virginia, the provisions of the act approved July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States." This joint resolution becomes necessary, because there is some difference of opinion as to the time when the counties named became part of the State of West Virginia. The object is to settle that date.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. LATHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WINONA AND ST. PETER'S RAILROAD.

Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the Winona and St. Peter's Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river, and to establish a post route; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of joint resolution of the Senate No. 87, to provide for the payment of bounties to certain Indian regiments; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and bill of the House of the following titles, the former without amendment and the latter with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 143) making an appropriation for the repair of the Potomac bridge; and

An act (H. R. No. 213) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 360) to regulate the appointment of paymasters in the Navy and explanatory of an act for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy;

An act (S. No. 368) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret A. Farran; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 65) explanatory of and in addition to the act of May 5, 1864, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in Wisconsin."

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, bill of the House No. 213, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COMMUTATION OF RATIONS.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to inform this House whether commutation of rations has been allowed soldiers while prisoners of war, and if allowed, whether such allowance has at any time been suspended, and if suspended, for what reasons.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The House then resumed, as the special order, the consideration of bill of the House No. 543, to restore to the States lately in rebellion their full political rights, upon which Mr. WINDOM was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Speaker, after the thorough discussion this question has received I can hardly expect to add anything new. But at a time like this silence is akin to cowardice; indifference is treason. The great struggle through which we are passing is of a two-fold character—it is a war of principles as well as of material forces. The latter is ended and our triumph is complete; but the conflict of principles still rages with increased vigor. Rebels vanquished in the field are encouraged from unexpected quarters to renew the contest in other and more dangerous forms. Foiled in their mad attempt to overthrow the Republic by force, they now hope to accomplish it by political strategy. In 1860 two modes of destroying the Government were considered by them. One was to rebel and by force of arms disrupt it; the other was to remain in their places of power, and, as they said, "fight it from the inside." Their councils were for a time divided as to which of these modes would be the more efficient and practicable. The "inside" policy would doubtless have prevailed had not a few hot-heads precipitated the decision by inaugurating open rebellion, thus compelling the more discreet to follow. The promise of Democratic leaders at the North to aid and assist them in maintaining the right of secession did much to induce the attempt; and the last Democratic President (James Buchanan) did what he could to make good that promise. But the people arose in the sublime majesty of their power and demanded the preservation of their Government. A storm of patriotic indignation swept over the country. These same Democratic leaders quailed before it, and instead of armed support, gave only the aid and comfort of their sympathy and secret conspiracies. Rebellion having failed through the inability of those allies to keep their pledges, the rebels now propose to try the other mode, namely, to take their seats in Congress and carry on the contest "from the inside." In this they have renewed assurances of aid from the North. Once more the people are called upon to preserve the Republic against the treachery of pretended friends and the machinations of avowed enemies. Their response is by no means uncertain. Already it has been heard in tones which those in high places would do well to heed. What we have heard is only the muttering of the distant storm which will soon break with fury upon the heads of those who are false to their trust. The loyal people have suffered too much and understand too well the issues of the hour to be deceived by demagogues or traitors. They will demand nothing for vengeance, but everything for security. Their generosity is unbounded, but it will not yield an iota of principle.

The issues which now distract the country could have been easily avoided. The conflict of principles might have ceased with the conflict of arms. When Lee surrendered the rebels understood it to be an entire surrender of the "cause" and of the principles upon which it was based. They did not doubt the right or the determination of the Government to insist upon this, and knowing that by treason and rebellion they had justly forfeited life and property, both of which were at the mercy of the victors, they were quite willing to purchase these by yielding to any just demands. They felt that, having staked everything upon the wager of battle and having lost, it was the right of the conqueror to impose terms and the duty of the conquered to submit. They understood well the principles of liberty and equal rights, for which the nation had contended, and they anticipated such terms and conditions as would forever guaranty them. Had the President then called an extra session of Congress, and upon consultation with the people, through their Representatives, agreed upon and demanded such terms, they would have been gladly accepted, and the whole country would have long ago rejoiced in peace. Just here was committed the fatal blunder which has led to all our present troubles, and which bids fair to disturb and agitate the political elements for years to come. Reconstruction and reconciliation were then plain and easy. Now they are complicated and difficult. The President's intentions, as disclosed by his speeches, at that time were right. He hated treason, and declared it should be made "odious." He despised traitors, and said they should be "punished." Those were brave and patriotic words, and they found a hearty response in every loyal breast. But during all the last summer and autumn he suffered himself to be surrounded by pardon-seeking rebels, who filled his audience room, crowded the ante-chambers, halls, and lobbies of the White House, and knelt before him, with well-dissembled loyalty on their lips, while treason rankled in their breasts. He believed their assurances, and was flattered and deceived.

His hatred was turned to compassion, his distrust to confidence.

"Vice is a monster of such hideous mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Having persuaded the Executive and a portion of his Cabinet that their policy of reconstruction is the only proper and constitutional one, the rebels now seek, through the aid of their old party associates at the North, to impose it upon the country. Against this policy the majority in Congress protests, and demands one which is approved by the loyal people. Briefly stated, the real issue between the rebels and Congress is, shall the principles for which we sacrificed a quarter of a million precious lives and untold millions of public treasure be abandoned at the dictation of traitors? The rebels say "yes;" Congress answers "no." Shall vanquished traitors be permitted through their representatives in Congress to seize upon the Government they have tried to destroy, and thereby accomplish by political strategy what they have failed to do by courage in the field? The rebels insist upon it; Congress protests. Has the Government a right to demand of traitors, as a condition precedent to their full restoration to political power, such guarantees as will insure its own safety, guard its honor, and protect its humblest defender in all the rights of citizenship? Congress asserts that right. The rebels deny it, and insolently demand immediate and unconditional restoration as one of their constitutional rights. Shall the rebellious States come back with largely increased political powers, as the result and reward of treason, or shall the Constitution be so amended as to make the basis of representation just and equitable, and thereby place the North and South on an exact equality in this respect? Congress says it shall be so amended. The rebels say it shall not, and that they are entitled to come back at once without terms or conditions of any kind.

How far the rebel policy has been impressed upon the Administration may be seen by reference to the President's last annual message, his veto of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, his 22d of February speech, and his veto of the civil rights bill, all of which he has declared to be the authoritative enunciations of his policy. Interpreted by these utterances, that policy declares: first, that inasmuch as the acts of secession are void and the withdrawal of a State from the Union is legally impossible, the rebellious States have never lost their places as States in the Union, and that they therefore are, and constantly have been, entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities appertaining to any State, among which is the right of the people to immediate representation in Congress without the exaction of any condition whatever; second, that as representation and taxation are inseparable, Congress has no right to impose the one until it grants the other; third, that it is a grave question whether any laws affecting the interests of the people of those States can be constitutionally enacted so long as they are denied representation in Congress; fourth, that the Executive alone is authorized to investigate and decide all questions appertaining to the internal condition and Federal relations of those States; that the people, through their representatives in Congress, are entitled to no voice on the subject of reconstruction, except that "each House may judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members;" but that this right is no broader when applied to an applicant for a seat from a disloyal than to one from a loyal State; that, therefore, in appointing a joint committee "to inquire into the condition of those States," and into the loyalty or disloyalty of their people, and their consequent fitness or unfitness to participate in the administration of the Government, Congress has flagrantly transcended its powers, usurped executive prerogatives, and contumaciously hindered and obstructed the reunion of the States; fifth, that the freedmen of the South, whom we called upon to defend us in the day of our great peril, to whom we gave the solemn assurance of national protection as well as freedom, and who, trusting our plighted honor, fought with us for the nation's life, shall have no protection for their persons or their property, and no civil or political rights except such as the authorities of their respective States may choose to extend to them, and that they shall have no voice in the selection of those authorities; that loyal white men, who have suffered and fought for the Union, shall have no political advantages over rebels who have wickedly attempted its overthrow.

The central, governing principle of this policy, from which its other elements spring as branches from the parent trunk, is found in the declaration that the rebellious States are, and constantly have been, entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of any State, and that, consequently, the people thereof are entitled to demand immediate representation in Congress, without any conditions whatever.

The President is good enough to inform us that he as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy has required of them certain terms with which they have complied, namely, the adoption of the anti-slavery amendment, the repudiation of the confederate debt, and the abrogation of their secession ordinances; that no other terms are necessary or proper, and therefore he and the rebels have fully performed the work of reconstruction; that he has guarantied to those States a republican form of government, as required by the Constitution of the United States. He further declares, through his Secretary of State, that reconciliation and not reconstruction is now the obligation resting upon us. That Congress has no duty to perform in the premises but to admit at once the Senators and Representatives from the South, and thereby complete the work of reconciliation.

It is true that to Congress is generally conceded the right to examine and judge of the credentials of an applicant for a seat, in order to ascertain whether they are in proper form, and also to inquire if he has a majority of the votes cast in his district, and if he is of proper age. But we are by no means to ask anything about the kind of government established in the State from which he comes, or the character of the people who send him to represent them. Having ascertained that his credentials are formal, that he is twenty-five years of age, and has a majority of all the votes cast in his district, we are to be permitted to administer to him an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. When we shall have done this much, and brought back all the southern Representatives, it is supposed we will be once more in the full enjoyment of the blessings of complete restoration, peace, and union.

This grand panacea for all our political ills is based upon the theory that the people who attempted by violence and perjury to destroy the Government, who waged a most wicked and diabolical four years' war for the establishment of a slaveholding empire upon the ruins of the Republic, who murdered our soldiers in cold blood, who fired our hotels filled with women and children, who starved our soldiers to death in loathsome prison-pens, within sight of storehouses groaning with confederate supplies, who polluted the fountains of life by knowingly inoculating prisoners with the virus of a nameless disease which will scourge them to their graves and entail untold sufferings upon their innocent offspring, who laid down their arms only when our victorious bayonets were at their throats, and who, when professing to accept the issues of war, assassinated the nation's honored chief—that this people, without any evidences of repentance, but with every indication of sorrow for the "lost cause," and of bitter hatred toward the Government and its defenders, have suddenly become sufficiently loyal to be trusted with all the rights and franchises they have renounced and forfeited; that in "accepting the situation" they have entitled themselves to step at once, unquestioned, from the rebel congress and the rebel camps into the halls of legislation to make laws for the Republic which they have so recently tried in vain to destroy; to become the guardians of our widows, orphans, and disabled soldiers, and custodians of all the civil and political rights of the humble-colored patriots whom they held in slavery as long as they could.

But it is claimed by some of its supporters that this policy demands the admission of loyal Representatives only, without regard to the character of their constituencies. Unfortunately the term "loyalty" seems to have acquired an exceedingly doubtful meaning. The South use it to define a faithful adherence to rebellion and treason. A certain class of northern Democrats mean by it all manner of opposition to the war for the Union, an unwavering sympathy with its enemies so long as they had any hope of success in the field, and since their failure there a determination to restore them to power in the Government. The President in his 22d of February speech defines a loyal man to be one who acknowledges his allegiance to the Government and swears to support the Constitution of the United States, and adds by way of further explanation, "He (the rebel) cannot do this in good faith unless he is loyal. No amplification of the oath can make any difference; it is mere detail, which I care nothing about." By this definition, then, an acknowledgment of allegiance and an oath to support the Constitution purge the vilest traitor of all his treason, and convert him at once into a first-class patriot. And this for the extraordinary reason that one who has been a rebel cannot take the oath in "good faith unless he is loyal." The test oath which requires a man to swear that he has not borne arms against the Government, or voluntarily given aid and comfort to its enemies, is a mere "amplification" and cannot "make any difference; it is mere detail, which I (the President) care nothing about." Loyalty, as expounded by this very high authority, consists simply in swearing to support the Constitution in the future, which, of course, any rebel, from Jeff. Davis down, can readily do, for they have done that many times already, and as was said by another, have sworn to support the constitution of the southern confederacy in addition.

Sir, I have no confidence in the "good faith" of these constitutional oath-breakers. Treason has debauched their entire moral nature. Their oaths will be broken in the future with the same facility they have been in the past. I want some better guarantee for future loyalty than is to be found in the oath of a thrice-perjured traitor. Nor is this the kind of loyalty which the patriotic people whom I represent desire should govern this country. They do not believe the test oath to be a mere "amplification." If it be mere "detail" to require a man to purge himself of treason before he assumes to govern them, it is that sort of detail which in their opinion does make a material "difference," and about which they do "care." They were taught only a twelve month since that "treason is a crime and ought to be punished;" that "loyal men" whether white or black, should govern this country; that "the traitor who has raised a parricidal hand against the Government which protected him should be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship" even. They believe what they were then taught, and in the honest simplicity of their hearts cannot discover the severity of that "ordeal" which merely requires a traitor to make a trip to the White House, ask a pardon, and then swear to support the Constitution, in order to entitle himself to make laws to govern them. They believe, with the Andrew Johnson of 1864, that "before these repenting rebels can be trusted they must bring forth the fruits of repentance."

But it is also insisted by a very few of its supporters that this policy does not demand a repeal of the test oath. It is certainly not so understood by the rebels themselves, or by the masses of the Democracy at the North. I think it is hardly fair to say that the President himself or his Secretary of State so understands it; for they both complain that these insurgent States are not now admitted to representation. Mr. Seward said in New York, on the 22d of February, when expounding by authority the views of the Administration:

"Admit the southern Representatives at once. I thought it ought to have been done on the first day of the session."

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU,] who last addressed the House on this subject, assuming the championship of the President, declared that it had been in our power at any time during this session to have completed the work of reconstruction in fifteen minutes by admitting the southern members, and complains that this was not done.

Now, it is an indisputable fact, known to almost every intelligent man in the country, and clearly proved by officers of the Army and others who testified before the committee on reconstruction, and so reported by that committee—

"That in the face of the law requiring the test oath, the Senators and Representatives elected to Congress from those States are, with very few exceptions, men who had actively participated in the rebellion, and who insultingly denounce the law as unconstitutional."

Among them is the vice president of the so-called southern confederacy himself. And yet, with those facts before them, the originators and supporters of this policy complain that these Senators and Representatives were not "admitted at once, on the first day of this session." They could not be admitted except by committing perjury, or the repeal of the test oath. It will hardly be contended that they were expected to signalize the first act of their return, as they did the last of their withdrawal, by perjury. Am I not, therefore, justified in assuming the position that this policy does demand the repeal of the test oath?

But admit, if you please, that in this position I am mistaken, and that the President and those who sustain him mean that none but those who can take the test oath shall be admitted, it would still, in my opinion, be a most dangerous policy, and would defer the admission of traitors but a very short time; and for this reason: it will be an easy matter for the South to select men for the present Congress who have not borne arms against the Government or voluntarily given aid and comfort to the rebellion, and yet who are at heart no more loyal than many who were in the rebel army. These men, thus selected, will take their seats, and together with northern Democrats will repeal that oath. Their admission will establish the right of their districts to representation, however disloyal the people may be. This right once established, and the test oath repealed, what will follow? At the next election every disloyal district will send men who thoroughly represent the feelings and sentiments of the people, those who have been most obnoxious for their treason having the preference. What shall be done then? "Keep them out if disloyal," you say; but how can you keep them out? The right of the district to representation having been established by the admission of men who could take the oath at this Congress, those who are elected to the next will demand that the Clerk of the House place their names on the roll to be called to vote upon the organization. This the Clerk will be compelled to do, and the vilest rebels and guerrillas of the South will have an unquestionable right to participate in the most important act of the Congress, namely, its organization. They will then step up to the desk and take the oath to support the Constitution without any of those troublesome "amplifications" and "details" concerning their past conduct, and will, to all intents and purposes, be members of Congress. What then do you propose to do?

"Expel them if disloyal," says another. But it requires a two-thirds vote to expel a member. They will all be upon the floor to vote in their own cases, and aided by their northern Democratic allies everybody knows that it would be an utter impossibility to expel Jeff. Davis himself should he be elected. No, sir; adopt this policy and in less than two years every disloyal district will be represented by a traitor, and traitors will control the legislation of the country. Instead of being able to expel them for their treason you will have to apologize for having whipped them. The brave men who fought our battles and saved the Republic will have to conceal their honorable scars lest they may give offense to the "reconstructed South;" just as now the military authorities at West Point order the erasure of inscriptions from captured rebel cannon in order that when the young "gentlemen" from the South return their pride may not be touched by witnessing the evidences of their defeat. Oh, magnanimous policy! Magnanimous to enemies, cruel to friends!

Another inevitable consequence of this policy will be that no changes of the Constitution, whereby guarantees will be furnished which are necessary for the safety of the Government, can ever be secured. It is an explicit declaration that we have no right to demand such guarantees as conditions precedent to representation. It is so understood everywhere, and especially at the South. A. H. Stephens, vice president of the southern confederacy, and Senator-elect to Congress from Georgia, so understands it when he declares that it meets his hearty approval, and coolly informs us that the South would rather remain unrepresented than to accept any terms as conditions precedent. If such amendments of the Constitution are not secured before the full restoration of those States, we all know that they never will be, until they are obtained by another war, for it requires a two-thirds vote in Congress to propose, and a three-fourths vote of all the States to adopt them. This every sane man knows would be impossible. I am therefore justified in asserting that those who support this plan of reconstruction intend that no constitutional amendments, affecting the interest of the South, and guarantying the honor and safety of the nation, shall ever be made. What will be the consequence? By the Constitution (unamended) two fifths of all negroes who were slaves, but who have been liberated by the war, will be added to the basis of representation, thereby giving the South thirteen additional Representatives on this floor; thirteen additional Representatives taken from the loyal and transferred to the disloyal States; a number equal to the representation of more than six such States as Minnesota; a gain in this House to the South as against the North greater than the political power exercised by the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, Nevada, Oregon, and California, or equal to all the New England States combined. For it must be borne in mind that these thirteen Representatives are not merely to be added to the South, but they are to be deducted from the North, making a relative difference of twenty-six in favor of the disloyal section of the country. Nor is this vast political power to be taken from the loyal people of the North and given to the loyal people at the South, upon whose numbers it is based, but it is to be handed over to the traitors to be wielded for the oppression of our defenders who live among them, and against the welfare of the country. The vote of a South Carolina rebel is to be made equal to the votes of three soldiers of my own State, thus reaffirming by law the old insulting boast that "one of the chivalry is equal to three northern mudsills."

Is this the way "treason is to be put down and traitors punished?" Is this the way by which "loyal men, whether white or black, shall rule this country?" Is this the way "treason is to be made odious?" Is this what Andrew Johnson meant when he said "the traitor ceased to be a citizen and forfeited his right to vote with loyal men when he renounced his citizenship and sought to destroy our Government?" Should he not rather have said that loyal men by fighting for their country forfeited their right to vote with traitors? Ah, sir, is not that a novel mode of punishing traitors which reinvests them at once with all their former powers, and as a premium for treason gives them an additional political power equal to that exercised by six loyal States? If the eleven rebel States were admitted now they would have twenty-two Senators. The other five States which belonged to the slaveholding class, namely, Kentucky, Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, and West Virginia, would doubtless add five more, giving them twenty-seven Senators.

It will be seen by reference to the census of 1860 and the apportionment of 1861 that the eleven confederate States have fifty-eight Representatives. Giving them one half the representation from the five States just named, (they are reasonably certain of a much greater proportion,) and they will have seventy-one. Add the thirteen Representatives which they will receive, as just shown, by reason of the abolition of slavery, and they will have eighty-four members and twenty-seven Senators, making at least one hundred and eleven votes in the Electoral College. They will thus have more than one third of both the Senate and House, and more than one third of the votes for President and Vice President of the United States. This power will be in the control of a white population embracing less than one sixth of the whole population of the country. So that the effect of this policy will be to give to less than one sixth of the people (a large majority of whom are disloyal,) more than one third of the political power of the whole. If by any means they can secure one sixth more of the representation they will have a majority in Congress and in the Electoral College, and will of course elect their own President and make laws to suit themselves.

Does any one who has given the least attention to the working of political parties in this country believe for a moment that a compact, well-drilled organization at the South, which needs only one sixth of the representation from the North to give it control of the Government, will have any difficulty in obtaining that sixth? I think not? That party at the North which is now willing, for the sake of political alliance with rebels, to thus disfranchise its own section and inflict so wicked an injustice upon the loyal people, may well be trusted to go far enough to reap the fruits of such an unholy alliance. If by such combination a majority could be secured in Congress, the southern wing of the party would have so large a proportion of that majority that they would of course insist, as they always have done, upon controlling the organization of the House and dictating the formation of its committees. This being done, what may we reasonably expect? First, either the assumption of the rebel debt or the repudiation of our own. No man not totally blinded by partisan zeal can for a moment believe that the representatives from the South, with the control of Congress in their hands, will meekly, year after year, vote appropriations and tax their constituents to pay interest on a debt contracted, as they affirm, in waging an unjust war upon them, unless the people of the North reciprocate by taxing themselves to pay the debt of the South, incurred, as they contend, in self-defense.

The next thing we may certainly anticipate will be a demand for compensation for the loss of slaves, amounting to a sum far greater than the entire cost of the war. This demand we will have no more power to resist than the former, and it will be either paid or compromised by a consent to reenslave by some other name their negroes.

Then will be presented the question of bounties to our soldiers and pensions to the disabled and the widows and orphans of the dead. With such a majority controlling the Government, how will this question be met? Precisely as we have seen in the case of the national and rebel debts. They will refuse to appropriate money to pay pensions and bounties to our soldiers and to their widows and orphans unless similar provisions are made for theirs. They will demand, and the demand will be conceded, that those who fought in the ranks of treason shall be placed upon an equality with the patriot heroes who bore the flag of the Republic through so many bloody battles. And why not? If the "lost cause" was so commendable that we are willing to confer upon the South thirteen additional Representatives as the reward of her efforts, will it be very difficult to show that the men who were disabled in defending that cause should be provided for as well, at least, as those who endeavored to overthrow it? But I am told that the South would be in a minority, and that none of these things could be done without the aid of the North, and that such aid could not be given. Away with this delusion, sir! I repeat that the party which to-day, for the sake of power to be gained from rebel alliances, is clamoring for a basis of representation so flagrantly unjust and so obviously exposed to the dangers suggested, may for the same reason be implicitly relied upon to give all the aid that will be required. The same men who sympathized with rebellion throughout the war, whose indignation was never stirred by any of the atrocities committed by the rebels, whose patriotism could rejoice at Union defeats and mourn over Union victories, who conspired with foreign Governments against their own country, and who denounced the noble Lincoln as a tyrant and our soldiers as his hirelings, will not be slow to obey the behests of their southern masters when they are once more installed in their places of power.

But I must not dwell longer upon this much talked of "policy." I have endeavored only to suggest some of its more prominent features, and to point out some of its inevitable results. If anything more than its mere statement be needed to secure for it the reprobation of all loyal men, it will be found in the character of its supporters. I do not deny that some good men, who have not taken the trouble to thoroughly investigate it, approve it. But I cannot doubt that such men will soon awake, in utter astonishment at the company in which they find themselves; and that when the President looks about him and finds that in this House not a single man among all those who supported him for the Vice Presidency indorses it, and that the House truly reflects the loyal sentiment of the country, he will be induced to reconsider and reject it. While it is true that some good men approve it, it is equally true that there is not an enemy of republican institutions, at home or abroad, who does not eulogize it and glorify its author. Every prominent rebel whose hands are yet red with the blood of our murdered defenders extols it. Every keeper of southern prison-pens, whose ears were deaf to the supplications of starving prisoners, commends it. The happy possessors of drinking-cups made of the skulls of our fallen heroes drink to its success. Lee, Beauregard, Mosely, Forrest, Semmes, A. H. Stephens, and a host of other like worthies, pronounce it the only proper theory of restoration. Every aristocrat in Europe, who during the war conspired with our enemies and poured contempt upon our cause and our efforts, praises it. Northern sympathizers, who traduced and maligned Mr. Lincoln and his Administration, are in ecstasies over it.

Why such commendations from such men? Is there nothing in their unanimous and enthusiastic indorsement to arouse the suspicion of the thinking and patriotic that some great mischief, some imminent danger, may lurk beneath it? When traitors praise, let patriots beware. It promises peace, immediate restoration, universal harmony, but beneath are concealed injustice, cowardice, treachery, and ruin.

Antagonized to this is the policy of the Union party, sometimes called the "congressional policy." As enunciated by the measures already passed and those now pending, it declares:

1. That the secession of a State and the rebellion of its people "deprives it of all civil government" and abrogates all its rights and privileges in the Union, but does not in any way affect its obligations to the Union.

2. That such State can be restored only by the act of the loyal people, expressed through their representatives in Congress, and until such restoration takes place its people have no right to demand representation.

3. That it is the duty of Congress to first ascertain whether or not the people of the South are in a condition to participate, safely, in administering the Government. If they are, to restore them at once. If they are not, to provide, as conditions precedent to their admission, such irreversible guarantees as will insure the safety of the Republic and prevent future rebellions.

After a full and careful investigation, believing that the people of the South are, not in a condition to safely participate in the Government without additional guarantees, and that amendments to the Constitution have become imperatively necessary by reason of the changed condition of affairs, Congress proposes to submit to the people of all the States, for their ratification or rejection, the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

ARTICLE —.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring.) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —.

SEC. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave, but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

These are the only changes proposed to the Constitution. Are they not all generous and just? The injustice, if any, of the first section consists in not including political as well as civil equality among its guarantees. The freedman who saved the life of the Czar of Russia was at once raised to the dignity of a nobleman. The freedman who helped us to save the life of the great Republic is still to remain a political pariah, without even the power to defend himself at the ballot-box. And yet when it is proposed to say to the baffled paricide, who has forfeited life, liberty, property, and citizenship, "Your life shall be spared, your liberty shall be unabridged, your property shall be protected, you may again enjoy the rights you have renounced and forfeited," he complains of severity and want of magnanimity, because he is required to respect the life, liberty, and property of the freedman.

Is it not the negro rather than the rebel who has reason to complain of this section?

Is there anything unjust or ungenerous in the second section, which provides a basis of representation equitable to all sections, and corrects the glaring inequalities which we have seen will otherwise exist? The propriety and necessity of this section are so apparent that its mere statement is the strongest possible argument in favor of its adoption. It does not propose to humiliate the South or deny her a single right. It demands only that she shall stand on an exact equality with ourselves. Nothing more and nothing less. I would like to see the man who can stand before a loyal constituency and contend that a southern rebel shall be clothed with twice as much political power as a northern loyalist.

Let our Democratic friends who voted against this section go home and tell their constituents the plain truth, that under the Constitution, and by reason of changes effected by the war, each and every rebel vote counts as much in the election of President and members of Congress as the votes of two northern soldiers, and that they refused to let the people have an opportunity to amend the Constitution in this respect. Tell the working men of the North that they are to be robbed of thirteen Representatives in Congress in order that the "chivalry" may have that much additional power as a reward for their treason, and that you would not consent to a remedy for this injustice. Tell them these simple, obvious facts, and that you desired to confer as much power as possible upon the South, to the end that, by combining with traitors, you may attain political power, and I apprehend the next Congress will not see you here to combine with any party. The people are desperately in earnest on this question. They see the existing injustice and the impending danger, and are determined to remedy the one and avert the other. Woe to him who attempts to hinder them in the execution of their righteous will!

The third section, providing for the exclusion from office, State and Federal, of certain classes of prominent, perjured, and dangerous traitors, meets my unqualified approval. The test it applies seems to me to be an eminently proper one. The assertion that he who has once taken an oath to support the Constitution and voluntarily violated that oath is not to be trusted, challenges the assent of every right-minded man. Its propriety is seen also in the class of persons whom it disfranchises. It strikes at those members of Congress who plotted and instigated the rebellion; those officers of the Army and Navy who were educated by the Government for its defense, but who in the hour of danger basely betrayed their flag and country; those members of State Legislatures and other officers who led the misguided masses into treason. It is just what the true men North and South demand, and yet I doubt not it will be assailed by the Opposition with the most intense malignity. It touches a tender point. For if leading rebels are to be excluded from office, State as well as Federal, there is a reasonable probability that the loyal men of the South will control it, and in that event the long-anticipated political millennium, in which the secession lion and the Democratic lamb shall lie down together on downy beds of power, will be as far removed as ever. But notwithstanding this opposition it will prove the most popular amendment proposed. Its justice, its safety, its propriety, as well as its generosity toward the misguided masses of the South, will commend it to all who have the interest of the country more at heart than the interests of a political party.

These men who are to be thus disfranchised, have justly forfeited every right they once possessed. In any other Government on earth they would be hung or banished, and their property would be confiscated. We only propose that, having attempted to ruin, they shall not now rule. They may remain in the country, retain their property, and enjoy with us the equal protection of the laws, but they shall not govern loyal men. Here, as in every other proposition contained in this amendment, nothing is demanded for vengeance, but everything for security. Public safety and national honor require their disfranchisement. Conscience and the common sense of mankind approve it. But observe with what care this section is guarded to avoid unnecessary severity. If at any time their good conduct shall prove that they have repented of their treason, and can safely be trusted with the exercise of power, it is provided that this disfranchisement may be removed by a two-thirds vote of Congress. At present they are to be required, in the language of Andrew Johnson, "to take a back seat in the work of reconstruction;" but if hereafter they bring forth the fruits of repentance, they may be permitted to "come up higher."

The fourth section is designed to prevent a repudiation of the Federal debt, and to insure the payment of pensions and bounties to our soldiers and sailors. It also prohibits the assumption or payment of the confederate debt, or of any claim for compensation for the loss or emancipation of any slave, thereby guarding the loyal people against taxation to pay the expenses of an effort to destroy them. I will not insult the intelligence of this House or of my constituents who may be good enough to read my remarks, by discussing the propriety and justice of this section. Its necessity I have already shown. The finances of the country demand not only that the payment of these debts and claims shall be made impossible, but that the question of possibility shall be put beyond the reach of discussion. The mere agitation of such a proposition will prove ruinous to our credit. A very large portion of the rebel indebtedness is held by our enemies in Europe, who will take especial pleasure in using it to cripple and embarrass our credit abroad, and who will also coöperate powerfully with our enemies at home in the effort to compel its assumption by the Government. Hence, I desire to place the prohibition where it will be forever beyond the reach of agitation.

In addition to these proposed constitutional amendments, the bill reported by the reconstruction committee and now pending declares that whenever the constitutional amendments, before referred to, shall have become a part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after taking the required oath of office, be admitted into Congress as such, and that such State may assume its proportion of the direct tax under the act of 1861, and the payment thereof may be postponed for a period not exceeding ten years.

This is simply an enabling act expressing the terms and conditions upon which Senators and Representatives may be admitted, and is designed to hasten as much as is possible and consistent with public safety, the return of those States to their places in the Union. I regret to learn that there is a disposition anywhere to postpone action on this bill. Having agreed upon the constitutional guarantees which we deem essential, let us now give to the country a completed plan of reconstruction. Let us declare boldly and unequivocally upon what terms the insurgent States may return. Believing, as I do, that the amendments we have proposed are eminently proper and indispensably necessary, it seems to me that this bill, which makes their ratification a condition precedent to full restoration, is equally proper and necessary. In this measure, as in the others to which I have alluded, the generous spirit of the Government is manifested toward the people of the insurgent States. The loyal people of the North, carrying all the heavy burdens of the war, have paid their share of the direct tax under the act of 1861. But the South is poor. She has made herself so by trying to destroy the Government, and yet the North says to her, "Come back and enjoy the protection of the same laws which protect us, and your burdens shall be made as light as possible; your share of taxes, long since due, shall be postponed for ten years. Not only shall there be no confiscation of your property, but fearing your just debts may be too burdensome we will postpone their payment to suit your convenience." Again, I ask, under what other Government on earth was generosity like this ever exhibited to traitors?

Radical as is the difference between these respective policies of the Union party and that of the Executive, it is, after all, not so much a disagreement in regard to the powers of the Government as in regard to the extent to which those powers shall be exercised. At the close of the war the President held that the relations existing between the insurgent States and the Union had been disturbed and that those States had been "deprived of all civil government" by secession and rebellion. Acting upon this opinion he required, as a condition precedent to their restoration, the ratification of the great anti-slavery amendment, and the repudiation by State action of the rebel indebtedness. He still holds, I believe, that the Government had the constitutional power to exact those terms. But having done this much, and thereby conceded to the fullest extent the power of the Government over the subject, he now contends we shall go no further. I approve of what he has done in this respect, but claim that it falls far short of what is necessary, and insist that the safety of the Republic demands other conditions and guarantees.

The last six months have furnished indubitable evidence that a majority of the southern people are quite as disloyal at heart to-day as they were at any time during the war. Witness their lamentations for the "lost cause;" their insults to the national flag; their toasts and public demonstrations in honor of the most obnoxious leaders of the rebellion; their ostentatious honors to the rebel dead, exhibited by processions bearing flowers and strewing them upon their graves; their mobbings of black loyalists who attempted to bestow similar tokens of respect to the memory of our fallen heroes who sleep in southern graves; their violent efforts to drive out the few Union people who remain among them; their murders of Unionists, and destruction of their dwellings, school-houses, and churches, and their almost universal expressions of hatred, made in every form and in every place, of the men who have been most active and prominent in crushing the rebellion. They have demonstrated to us, also, by the reenactment of vagrant laws and slave codes for freedmen, with how much sincerity they agreed to the abolition of slavery, and how readily that institution, abolished in name, may be reestablished in fact and with increased cruelty. They have by State laws repudiated the rebel indebtedness; but we all know that the same Legislatures, or State conventions, which repudiated them, may to-morrow wipe out that act of repudiation and tax the loyal people to pay them. In fact they have given us timely notice of their intentions on this subject as well as on many others. Mr. Simons, a prominent member of the Georgia convention, which the President convened for the purpose, among other things, of repudiating this debt, said:

"Let us repudiate only under the lash and the application of military power, and then, as soon as we are an independent sovereignty, restored to our equal rights and privileges in the Union, let us immediately call another convention and assume the rebel debts."

In nearly all of the conventions held in those States the same feeling prevailed. They said, "Let us under the lash" abolish slavery and repudiate the confederate debt, and then, as soon as we "get our rights in the Union," we will, by legislative enactments, restore substantial slavery and assume those debts. Under this inspiration the President's propositions just mentioned were accepted by them. All these things, and a thousand others with which we are sadly familiar, attest the present spirit and temper of the South, and admonish us that "the time to fasten the bolts of a ship is when she is on the stocks," and warn us to look well to her condition before we take on board a mutinous crew, whose declared intention has been to scuttle and sink her. We therefore insist that proper and necessary guarantees of justice, liberty, and safety shall not be left in the keeping of those who may at any moment repeal them, but that they shall be imbedded in the firm foundations of the Republic, where they will be forever irrevocable, to wit, in the Constitution of the United States; and that this shall be done as a condition-precedent to the admission of the southern Senators and Representatives.

A gentleman from my own State, who holds a seat in the other end of this Capitol, and supports the policy of the Administration, said recently in a speech at Philadelphia:

"The majority in Congress intend to keep these States out. The President wants to get them in. Congress is laboring to devise some plan by which the States may be kept out, while the President and his friends have labored faithfully, honestly, and patriotically to devise some way by which they may get in."

That Senator, if he has taken the trouble to observe the issue between Congress and the President, knows that he has not truly or fairly stated it, and he knows, also, that it is precisely the statement that Jeff. Davis or C. L. Vallandigham would have made had they stood where he did. The true issue is, not whether those States shall come in or be kept out, for all agree that they shall come in, but shall they come in now, at once, without conditions or guarantees of any kind, without any evidence of loyalty, and with a twofold representation? Shall they come clothed with twice the power possessed by the same number of loyalists, or shall they wait a little, until these matters can be examined and adjusted? The supporters of the Administration say they shall come in now, and at once, in order that they may be consulted about this question of adjustment, and may have a voice in determining what it shall be. We say, "Let us have a little time to consider and investigate this matter; you have been fighting four years to keep out of the Union; pray do not become nervous, gentlemen, if it takes us a few months to put the old homestead in proper order for your reception. There are certain repairs to be made which we think are indispensable to your comfort and happiness as well as to our own. The disease, too, from which you have suffered must be taken into account. It is secession—a desire to get out of the Union. We want a thorough cure, so that you will never have a symptom of the ugly malady again. May it not be that a brief homeopathic treatment on the principle 'similia similibus' will meet your case? Be assured that we have no desire to keep you out for the purpose of punishment, and that just so soon as the repairs upon the old family mansion, made necessary by your own misconduct, are completed, and you are in a condition to come back without infecting the rest of the family with your hateful malady, we will joyfully hail your return. But as to inviting you back now, and at once, unhealed and unwashed, for the purpose of consulting you about the nature and manner of those proposed repairs, we think there would be about as much reason in opening our doors to the midnight assassin who recently murdered a part of our children, in order that he may be consulted as to the best way to guard the rest from danger."

The same gentleman to whom I have just referred calls upon his Philadelphia Democratic admirers to aid him and the President in rebuilding the temple of liberty, and says:

"Let us replace its broken arches. Let us restore its crumbled columns and rebuild its wasted walls, that the tribes of the North and of the South may again, as in the olden time, meet there and worship together at liberty's shrine in peace and harmony."

Sir, who is responsible for those "broken arches," those "crumbled columns," and those "wasted walls?" The very men whom he is so anxious to invite back. If the temple is to be rebuilt, does not common prudence require that it be done by its friends and not its enemies? I confess it is somewhat out of repair, but I prefer that the Vandals who tried to destroy it should not take the contract to rebuild. Do not their past conduct and present temper furnish some reason to apprehend that they would omit from those "arches" and "columns" the cement of justice and civil equality, without which the edifice would tumble down upon our heads. I have some recollection also of the "peace and harmony" with which "in the olden time" the aforesaid "tribe of the South" worshiped in that temple. It was my good, or ill fortune, to be present at some of their devotions, and to witness the religious zeal with which—pistol and bow-knife in hand—they strove to drive out liberty's true worshippers in order that they might debauch her at her very shrine. I have seen this same devout "tribe of the South" raise their hands toward Heaven and swear to defend that "temple of liberty," and before the ink was dry that had recorded their oaths I have seen them go out to plot and conspire together for its destruction.

I have seen them seize upon the revenues of liberty and appropriate them for the support of their unclean goddess, slavery. I have seen them steal from the "temple of liberty" the arms and munitions of war which were stored there for her defense, and then turn them against the "temple" itself. Having witnessed these devotional exercises of the "tribe of the South," I may be excused for insisting that before they return to renew their "worship" we shall have time to rebuild those "broken arches," "crumbled columns," and "wasted walls" in our own way. When every part has been thoroughly reconstructed and all the weak points encased with impenetrable iron walls, which neither treachery nor rebellion can ever mar or shake, I desire their return, but not before.

Sir, it seems to me that this demand for the immediate restoration to power of those men without repentance and without conditions or guarantees for the future presents a spectacle which has no parallel in history. Without just cause, without, in fact, any cause, and for purposes the most wicked and infamous, they renounced their allegiance to the Government which had always protected, pampered, and petted them, and waged, for four long and bloody years, a most atrocious war against it. Disregarding the ordinary rules of warfare recognized among civilized nations, they committed atrocities at which the whole world stood aghast. Pestilence, starvation, and cold-blooded murder were resorted to without scruple. Even the graves of the dead were invaded, and fiendish malignity found gratification in mutilating their sacred treasures. Against such an enemy the nation contended for its very existence. More than two million freemen left their homes and endured the trials and dangers of the field in its defense. A quarter of a million of precious lives and $3,000,000,000 of public treasure paid the price of victory. To save the Republic it has been draped with mourning and drenched with blood. During all these dark and gloomy years of carnage and desolation, those who forced all this sorrow and suffering upon the country have had their sympathizers and aiders and abettors at the North—men who, lost to every instinct of patriotism, if not of common humanity, resisted drafts, obstructed volunteering, opposed taxation, denounced our soldiers, declared the "war a failure," and did everything they dare to make it so, and in the midst of the struggle, when victory was just within our grasp, demanded an "immediate cessation of hostilities."

Now, what do we see? These same rebels and rebel sympathizers, before the smoke of battle has cleared away; before the bleeding wounds of our brave soldiers have been healed; before the blood of our murdered defenders has dried upon their garments; while the bones of our yet unburied martyrs still bleach beneath a southern sun; while loyal men are still denied the poor privilege of strewing flowers upon the graves of fallen heroes; while the South yet reeks with disloyalty and burns with ill-suppressed vengeance, these same men join hands and with all their old insolence demand not only the immediate and unconditional restoration to traitors of all their former political rights and privileges, but also the bestowal upon them of largely increased powers. Surely human history exhibits no such example of shameless audacity. To yield would be to present on our part an example of unsurpassed wickedness and folly. And yet for resisting this most extraordinary demand we are denounced as disunionists. What is our offense? We insist upon nothing for revenge; no blood, no executions, no banishments, no confiscations. We ask no indemnity for the past, for that is impossible. The dead cannot be revived; broken hearts cannot be healed. The horrors of Andersonville and Belle Isle can have no atonement in this world. But we do demand security for the future. In this, and this alone, consists our offense.

I have endeavored to point out the difference between the policy of the President and the policy of the Union party. Read side by side, in the light of their respective tendencies and inevitable results, they stand as follows:

The President's Policy.

It is the duty of Congress to admit the southern Senators and Representatives at once without regard to the loyalty or disloyalty of their constituents.

The Government has no right, at this time, to impose any terms whatever as conditions precedent to the full restoration of the insurgent States.

The Constitution shall not be amended in any way affecting the interests of the South until she is represented.

The freedmen of the South, who, at our request, fought with us for the Union, shall have no civil or political rights except such as the rebels may choose to give them.

As a result of the war, the North shall lose and the South shall gain thirteen additional Representatives and thirteen additional votes in the Electoral College, and the political power of one rebel shall be equal to the political power of two loyalists.

Traitors may not only vote twice, once for themselves and once for the negro, but they may also hold the highest official positions in the Government they have tried to destroy.

Our debts incurred in crushing rebellion, and our obligations to pay bounties and pensions to our soldiers and sailors, and to their widows and orphans, may all be repudiated at the will of traitors, with the aid of one sixth of the northern Representatives.

It shall not be made unconstitutional for the Government to assume and pay rebel debts and claims for loss of slaves, or to tax loyal men for this purpose.

The Union Policy.

Congress should take time to inquire carefully into the condition of the rebel States, and admit them just so soon as it can be done with perfect safety. Not one moment before.

The loyal people, by whose sacrifices the nation's life has been saved, have the right, and it is the duty of their Representatives to demand any and every guarantee necessary to insure its safety and guard its honor.

The Constitution must be amended before the full restoration of the South, or it never can be, except through another war.

No State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, nor make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of a citizen of the United States.

The Constitution shall be so amended as to place representation on an equitable basis, and thus prevent the flagrant injustice which will otherwise exist. Not to do so is to pay a premium to treason.

Leading traitors who have once violated their oaths to support the Constitution, shall not make or execute laws for loyal men. They may vote for themselves, but not for the negro.

The organic law shall declare that the validity of the public debt of the United States, including obligations for the payment of bounties and pensions, shall never be questioned.

Loyal men shall never be taxed to pay debts incurred for the destruction of their Government nor claims for loss of slaves; and the Constitution shall be amended so as to declare such debts and claims illegal and void, and so as to render their assumption and payment impossible.

It shall hereafter be the established theory of this Government that States may secede; their people may rebel and levy war against it, but as secession, rebellion, and war cannot change the status of a State in the Union, it is the right of rebels and traitors, as soon as they are whipped and disarmed, to return at once and make laws for their conquerors.

It shall hereafter be the established theory of this Government that the secession of a State and the rebellion of its people "deprives it of all civil government," and abrogates all its rights and privileges in the Union, but does not, in any way, affect its obligations; and that it can only be restored to its former relations by the law-making power, upon such terms and conditions as it may impose. If this be not so, the Government is powerless for its own protection. For "if rebellion succeeds, it accomplishes its purpose and destroys the Government. If it fails, the war has been barren of results, and the battle may be fought out in the legislative halls of the country."

I am free to say that the plan of reconstruction proposed falls short of what I desire, but I accept it because of the great good it contains, and because it is the best that can now be obtained. My own opinion is that if traitors are to vote at all, their votes should be neutralized by the ballots of loyalists, whether white or black. I believe that it is shameful ingratitude and gross injustice for this Government after calling upon any class of its citizens to defend it against its enemies, and after accepting their services, to turn upon them and say, "We will confer upon our enemies the right of suffrage, but you cannot exercise it for the reason that your complexion is not of the approved hue." Loyalty and not color should be the test. I believe, further, that if treason be a crime, enough has been committed within the last five years to entitle somebody to be hung.

In conclusion, let me say to gentlemen who think the loyal people of this country can be so far deceived as to adopt this policy of unconditional restoration with all its inevitable consequences, you sadly undervalue their intelligence and patriotism. They were in earnest in crushing the rebellion. They are no less in earnest in demanding a safe and just policy of reconstruction. They were not moved from their purpose during the war by losses in the field, by burdensome taxation, by threats of foreign intervention, nor by conspiracies and dissensions at home. They will not be moved from their present purpose by the blandishments of office, nor by the defection of pretended friends. No more sublime spectacle was ever witnessed than that which the courage, constancy, and patriotism of the loyal American people have exhibited during this struggle. They have demonstrated to the world that war with all its accumulated horrors cannot intimidate them, and that the allurements of official patronage cannot seduce or corrupt them. Such a people may be safely trusted to finish the great work they have begun. The nation's power is in their hands. They have purchased it at a fearful cost. They will keep it until equal and exact justice shall have been secured to every citizen, and until the great Republic, free, united, and prosperous, shall have achieved its glorious mission among the nations of the earth.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, having been up to this period of the session a silent member from choice, I deem it my duty now to declare my views upon some of the political questions which are presented for the consideration of this House and this country. Although my sentiments were well understood by my fellow-citizens who cast their votes for me at the last election, there has been since such a whirl in the political maelstrom that they might either fear that my own position had been changed or possibly they themselves might have been unable to withstand the mighty efforts made to draw them into the whirlpool.

In either event, it is proper and honorable that I, as their Representative, should make open and frank avowals in view of the political movements which must soon take place in my State and district. I should consider it a most ignoble act to win the support or indorsement of any man by the least concealment or deception. I would as lief cheat a man of his money as by hypocrisy and fraud to cheat him of his sentiments.

From this I hope, Mr. Speaker, you and this House will infer that I am but a poor politician, according to the meaning of that word in common parlance—a word but the synonym for fraud, violence, and such ignoble conduct as should deprive an honest man of his own self-respect, and would certainly bring about such a condition but that these traits of character are too common.

I then, sir, declare that in principle I now stand as I stood before the war; as I stood after war was declared; as I stood in the last Congress, when I received its crown of censure; as I stood in prison and before that infernal instrument of tyranny, a court-martial. And as I stand in principle so will I stand in practice whenever occasion may require.

When I indicate that there has been no change in my principles, this House, and this country possibly—for the avowal of them has been attended by an unexpected notoriety—may infer what my position now is. I am an old-line Democrat, and believe in the doctrine of secession. I believe that the several States of this Union have the right to separate from it, each acting for itself. I believe that abuses and usurpations had been practiced and threatened to so great an extent by their associates and partners in this governmental compact, that the southern States were justified in going out; and, sir, I further believe by their ordinances of secession, that they did go out, and thereby became to this Union foreign States. These convictions I cannot change, and I do not expect will ever be removed; I will most assuredly proclaim them and stand by them as long as a single citizen of the confederate States is in chains or subject to penalty for asserting them. There is no political or personal consideration which would prompt me to such a desertion. As the right of secession is the only thing that rescues them from the charge of treason, my voice shall ever accord with my convictions and never join in that verdict against them. I should consider myself as assuming a most infamous position if it did. What, sir, I that believe them right, I that would have joined them if the sovereign State of Maryland had said so, to desert them now in their utmost need, when I can legitimately give them such protection as is in my power honestly to give—never!

From what I have said, Mr. Speaker, this House will readily infer that I am adverse to the reconstruction policy of the President. I confess that Andrew Johnson has been, in adopting his mode of reconstruction, consistent with the views of the late President, with those of the Republican party that elected him, and with his own declaration from the time he abandoned the Democratic party and joined the Republicans. These facts do not commend him to me; but surely it is not his fault that he is now at issue with many of the people who raised him to his present station. Among acts of his Administration which receive my sternest denunciation, he has done and said some things which meet with my hearty concurrence. The vetoes he has during this session sent to Congress I need not mention, but there is one declaration of his which, if enforced by him, will cause his name to ring throughout the civilized world, and rank him high in the list of patriots. There was much in his speech on the 22d of February which I disapproved of, but there was one paragraph which sounded on my ear like "the voice of one crying in the wilderness, make the paths straight." I will read it, sir:

"The principle that carried us through the Revolution was, that there should be no taxation without representation. I hold to that principle, which was laid down as fundamental by our fathers. If it was good then, it is good now. If it was worth standing by then, it is worth standing by now. It is fundamental, and should be observed as long as free government endures."

This is the great blood-baptized principle of this American republican Government, consecrated to the noble blood of our heroic revolutionary fathers. For one, sir, I believe the President has the power to sustain this principle, as it is his most sacred duty to do so if he has. If it is "fundamental and should be observed as long as free government endures," then wherever his power reaches it has he recorded in heaven a sacred oath that he will preserve, protect, and defend it. Let taxation be suspended where representation is denied. Let him thus act and appeal to the American Anglo-Saxon race for the support and defense of time-honored Anglo-Saxon principles. This will bring the almighty dollar in its proper position, which opens the eyes of some who shut them to everything else. With them it is potent whether to be received by them or withheld from them. The necessity of an early reconstruction of some sort would then probably soon become apparent.

But to return; I stated that I was adverse to the President's specific policy of reconstructing this Union. In my view the southern seceded States have no right to Representatives on this floor or in the Senate, and by my vote I have heretofore invariably rejected every application which has been made by any person claiming such a right; and, sir, not only do I believe that they have no right in their present position to send Senators and Representatives here, but I do not think they have the right to furnish us with a President or Vice President, although there are many here and elsewhere, who, while agreeing with me that these States are out of the Union and not entitled to representation anywhere, have been so fraternal in their feelings and so magnanimous in their conduct as to go beyond the line in order to obtain the services of the gentleman who at present fills the executive chair of the United States. Being a citizen of seceded and unreconstructed Tennessee, he is, in my opinion, as also upon their theory, only President de facto, forced upon the country by their votes, attended by that very effective implement, their bayonets. When I cannot avoid it, I, like every one else, acquiesce in de facto Governments and de facto Presidents; but if it could be expected by any one that I can cast my vote at the next presidential election for Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, for that high office, then, at least, the status of Tennessee herself must be completely changed; she must be admitted into this Union by act of Congress upon her application to become a member of it. "New States may be admitted by Congress into this Union," says the Constitution, and this, according to my theory, applies to Tennessee, as also every other State that seceded. Why should I or any Democrat, at least southern Democrat, sacrifice our principles by casting a vote for a Lincoln Republican? Shall we indorse the acts of that party, or any man who belonged to it, by whom many of us, our wives, and children, have been reduced to poverty and want? Shall we kiss the hand that has thus scourged us or aided in giving the infliction? Who are his confidential advisers and counselors? Is there any one there who avows that his political action is controlled by a law higher than the Constitution of his country, any savage tyrant whose chief pleasure seemed to be derived from oppressing our citizens in direct violation of the Constitution? We will take time to inquire into and to reflect upon these matters.

I have said how I think these States can be admitted into this Union. It should be by act of Congress and with the assent of their people. But, sir, no congressional bill for that purpose can ever receive my vote as long as that test oath disgraces your statute-book. That test discriminates most effectually between citizens of these States, depriving all but a chosen few of the dearest political rights, and necessarily superinducing what seems to be so odious when only negroes are involved, a despicable oligarchy. It is an insidious and fatal blow at the political equality of white men and at our American republican form of government. I will do all I can to remove it, and if it cannot be removed I will do all I can to rescue the noble citizens of the South from the slavery and degradation it imposes even though it lead to a continuance of the dissolution of the Union. Anxious as I am to restore the States to their former status in the Union, I will not by my voice weaken those guarantees of liberty which our fathers established for themselves and for us their posterity, even to continue or preserve the Union itself. Liberty is worth more than Union. The Congress, sir, that will keep that test in force will only admit those southern men who will misrepresent their constituents. Better wait for better times and better men.

"When vice prevails, and impious men hear sway,
The post of honor is a private station."

There is another objection of a kindred character, and producing similar results to the one I have just referred to, which bears strongly upon my mind, and which, as the facts arise, would cause me to cast my vote against practically bringing about either mode of reconstruction. The exclusion from the ballot-box of the white men of the South in the choice of their Representatives, whether brought about under the President's plan or the congressional plan, shall never receive my sanction. No matter what pretense for excluding them from the polls, whether for too little loyalty or too much disloyalty, so called, by my vote such a corruption, leading ultimately to the overthrow of my country's liberty, shall never take place in this body-politic. That one tenth of the citizens of a State, with the aid of foreign force, should be allowed to alter its constitution and laws so as to disfranchise nine tenths, and call themselves the rightful government, in view of the fundamental principle upon which all our governments are based, is too absurd to enter the mind of any but a tricky tyrant. The State that adopts such a principle and the man who comes here in consequence of its adoption, shall never enter, the one into this Union, or the other into this House, if my voice can prevent it. They shall not extend here the infernal trail of the tyrant. They must come dressed in the pure American republican garb which our noble forefathers recognized and expected to be guaranteed, and not like a Juggernaut in its passage to the temple, crushing under its ponderous wheels the very vitals of true American republicanism.

But, Mr. Speaker, both sides, the southern and northern States, pretend to be anxious. I feel confident, under the circumstances in which they are placed, the southern States are willing to enter again into the compact, and be subject to the old Constitution of the United States. It was not the Constitution they fell out with, but the perversion of it by their northern associates, and their persistent designs to violate and destroy important rights which were secured by that instrument. Those rights have been destroyed, and can never again be a source of discord between the North and the South. Slavery has been abolished, and the seceded States have acquiesced in it; and the negro is placed in the position which you desired him to have when you provoked this war. It agonized you to think that he should be subjected to compulsory and uncompensated labor, and your agony has been removed. The idea of the free white northerners working by the side of or in view of a negro slave in the Territories of the Union, which seemed to horrify you, can now have no place in your minds, and your people and the free negro can mingle together, both socially and politically, in a manner to suit your tastes. This is the full extent of your expressed desire; and why, when you have all you desired when the war broke out, do you now throw obstacles in the way of reunion? You even professed to go to war for the Union, and now, when free negroism is obtained and union is offered, you refuse it, and decide it to be highly important to use the negro in various other phases for the purpose of enabling you still further and still longer to oppress your brethren of the South. You wish to use him as a lever in order to increase and preserve your own overgrown political power and diminish that of the South without in the least effecting any improvement in the condition of your pretended pet. You know your proposed amendment of the Constitution cannot be adopted if the southern States shall vote against it, and I think you must believe that it will never receive their assent. You can never hope for such a result, and they would deserve to be slaves should they aid in bringing it about. They will reject with scorn the terms of your proposed amnesty, and will await awhile the calm and considerate action of the people of this country to aid them in again honorably becoming members of this Union. You must answer to your people why it is. What is to be gained, under the circumstances, by keeping those out whom you are unwilling shall stay out, and who are willing to come in? You will certainly not try to humbug your constituents by pretending to any fear of the physical strength of the South. The confederacy has not under its control a single cannon, a single musket, or a single round of ammunition.

You will still further strive to allay the desire of the people for an early reunion by urging what I suppose weighs most heavily upon your minds. If we let in the South, you urge, they, together with our political opponents, the Democrats, with whom we fear they will unite, may be in a majority in Congress, and may be able to prevent we Republicans from passing such laws as may suit our purposes, and worst of all, may defeat our candidate for the Presidency. If your constituents to whom you urge these considerations are as shrewd as they have the character of being they will soon penetrate the thin mask thrown over your selfishness, and infer that the man who could urge such a reason either expected to be President himself or to hold some good fat office within his appointment. And if, too, your constituents are as intelligent and patriotic as you claim them to be, they would tell you that if the people of the southern States, when admitted, shall, with the northern Democrats, be able to thwart your selfish and ambitious views in this respect, it will be in perfect accord with the provisions of our Constitution and form of Government; and they will further say that the motives that operate upon you, if carried into practice, are a complete overthrow of the fundamental principle of our Government, that a majority of the people should have something to say in making or preventing the making of laws, or in electing a President.

But you will further urge that in such a condition of things they may repudiate the public debt. This your intelligent constituents will say is not a sufficient reason if true, because if the people of this country, in a proper constitutional mode, shall declare that this debt shall not be paid, they have the power to say so; and it is not because the bonds are all held North that they should not have and exercise this right if they choose. It is not the only debt by several that the people have repudiated, and are likely to repudiate. Besides, these bonds cost many who hold them a comparatively trifling sum. Cannot the northern and southern people, he will say, with the view of living in peace and good fellowship, put their heads together and devise some plan by which this evil shall be obviated? The resources of this country are enormous. Probably an increase of the debt, with a diminution of the interest, might have a tendency to strengthen the security and improve the value of the stock, and might, too, if judiciously distributed, be one of the strongest links to bind this Union together for ages. It is probable you are a holder of some of these bonds, and the view of your constituent does not excite agreeable ideas in your mind, and you drop the subject.

But you at him again, and urge the immense debt of gratitude this country is under to the negro as an excuse for making him, as it were, a condition precedent to reunion. Without their highly important aid we should never have overcome the South; indeed, they might have whipped us. Your constituent, if he is a man of spirit, will frown at this as being rather too degrading a position to be placed in, even to secure party ascendancy. The idea that five million white southerners could successfully contend against twenty-five million of his northern people does not strike him as being flattering to any but the southerners; and unless he is a man of very good temper, it is likely he will break off from you, exclaiming, in a very decided manner, that the negroes have all the rights we engaged for. They are free negroes, so called, and with a full understanding beforehand what free negroism meant. They have ample security for that position, and let them now take care of themselves. This country has been very happy and prosperous notwithstanding the former status of the free negro, and I am not willing to sow the seeds of future discord, and may be future wars, between the whites of this country in order to place him in a position which increases the happiness of neither white nor black, and probably diminish that of both. Theoretical perfection may be preached by your Beechers, Cheevers, and Phillips, but it will never be practically attained in this world. Thus would end the colloquy between you and your constituent. He has evidently the better of the argument, and appears to be a man not easily gulled.

Not heeding this counsel, you are bent on schemes which seem to contain nothing but the elements of mischief and revenge, leading to a continued and indefinite separation of the Union and aiming at the degradation of the white people of the South. This last you will not, and I say it in the name of the American people, you shall not, accomplish.

But there is something in the spirit of the southern people which will thwart your designs. If they have lowered the standard of their confederacy, they have not lowered the standard of their pride—a becoming pride in the estimation of an honorable enemy. The southerner has all around him, without speaking of the merits of the late contest, tokens of the endurance, courage, and prowess of his people. Sad spectacle though it be, it will not diminish his tone that he can on his own soil walk over the graves of nearly three hundred thousand of his courageous enemies, and—

"Standing on the Yankee's grave,
He will not deem himself a slave."

The schemes by which you will bring about some of the results I have alluded to are now before Congress and the country. You twist and turn and go through all the contortions of a serpent in order to make the negroes the fellow-citizens and equals of the white man, and yet you are not satisfied that you can do it. In the civil rights bill you boldly declared them to be citizens of the United States. I admired the boldness of the declaration, because it was known to come in direct conflict with the highest judicial authority in this country, and which rendered such a congressional declaration perfectly null and void.

The decision of the court in the Dred Scott case, attended with the lucid and powerful argument of that great judge and upright man, Chief Justice Taney, sustained by the opinion of Abraham Lincoln and Judge McLean, two fathers of your party, in the declaration that negroes are not citizens of the United States, the uniform practice of the States for years in rejecting the free negroes from their borders, would justify any judge in any State in repudiating the authority of that law.

The amendment of the Constitution now submitted to the country, and doubtfully reiterating the fact of negro citizenship, and otherwise in an equivocal manner struggling to bring about an equality of the races, will be spurned from their presence by the southern States, and, thank Heaven, there are southern States enough to make southern contempt for it effectual! It will hardly prove an annoyance. The States will still retain control and govern in their own way that portion of their population without leave asked of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, all the efforts made here or elsewhere to elevate the negro to an equality with the white man in the southern States, either civilly, socially, or politically, are perfectly idle. The negro must be kept in subordination to the white man, no matter how eloquently you may deck off the theory of equality. In my opinion there is, as it were, a declaration of war between these races. Its true active hostilities are suspended and the negro is under parole to keep the peace, but when and where they approximate to anything like equality in numbers the sword of power must be held over them. There are too many dear and cherished feelings and interests of the white race involved to relax that power for a single day. The negro must know it exists, and, if necessary, he must feel it. I say this with the kindest feelings and sympathy for the negro race. Full equality of rights will never exist between races so dissimilar that they cannot socially amalgamate, especially when they live together in large numbers. When amalgamation takes place, when marriage can be consummated between them, when the white woman shall bring forth negro offspring without a blush, and the white grandsire shall affectionately pat his nappy-headed grandson, then equality may be said to exist between the races. You may then with safety grant equal rights of all kinds, and possibly prepare for the millennium. Why, then, interpose such obstacles to a reunion?

But these are not all the difficulties interposed; some favor an almost indefinite postponement, urging with zeal that the South is too ignorant, too uncivilized, to be trusted with any share in this republican Government. Northern education and civilization must and should be more extensively spread among them before their admission to representation will cease to be dangerous. The honorable member from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] takes the lead in that position. In a speech delivered some time since, he declares—

"The great bulk of the people of the South are rude, illiterate, semi-civilized. Their condition in this respect would be shameful to any semi-civilized people, and is such as to render a republican Government, resting on the intelligent judgment of the people, an impossibility."

And again he says, in the same speech:

"As victors in the mighty struggle which has but lately terminated, and as the superiors of the South in enlightenment and Christianity, we can afford to be magnanimous to the highest degree compatible with public safety."

Mr. Speaker, in a little book which we slaveholders often read, it is written, "and he spake this parable unto certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others." We all know what that parable was, except, possibly, the gentleman from Minnesota. Sometimes it has been complained that the ignorant South has had the control for over sixty years, during which period, however, the country has vastly increased in those things which bring prosperity to a country. The chief drawback upon its happiness has sprung from that section in which learning is said to be so generally diffused. These are singular facts, and yet they do not convince me that the general diffusion of learning is an evil. It depends very much upon the soil upon which the seed is sown whether it will bring forth good or bad fruit; it is certain to bring forth some fruit. The noble barons of Runnymede could neither read nor write, but they ordered Magna Charta to be written for them, and it stamped their mark, and, like the so-called ignorant southerners, were willing to make a deeper mark in support of its principles. Our forefathers of the Revolution, who receive and are worthy of our admiration and gratitude, as a mass were vastly less learned than their present descendants. Education was attainable by comparatively few. It is a wonder their ignorance did not make a republican Government, to use the words of the honorable member, "an impossibility." They scented English tyranny quickly and afar off. It did not take much learning to teach them that taxation without representation made them slaves. They quickly saw that if England could tax grandmamma's tea, she might afterward tax granddaddy's land, and so they thought it was advisable to begin their resistance on the tea question. "Instinct is a great matter." The great principles of liberty can be understood by the most illiterate as well as by the most learned. They may not be able to write them out or make eloquent addresses about them, but they can readily understand them when read, and feel eloquence when it flashes for them. It takes wonderful power and ingenuity to mislead an independent though unlearned people in this respect. Sir, it is notorious that nearly all the uprisings for liberty in the Caucasian race have sprung from the illiterate and unlearned, headed by a few noble spirits who were more fortunate in that respect than themselves. They have been always ready when the proper leader appeared, whereas on the other side the general rule is that learning has sided with despotism.

The gentleman, to carry his specialty, for to give the South a northern education seems to be a specialty with him, in a speech delivered a few days back on this subject, speaks thus:

"Is it not a shame that this nation, which rests solely and alone upon the intelligence of the citizen, and without which it could not exist for an hour, should thus far have done literally nothing either to recognize or enforce education? France, Prussia, Austria, and Russia have made education an affair of state, and have esteemed it of the highest consequence. In Prussia the Minister of Public Instruction ranks next to the King."

And yet, Mr. Speaker, the Governments the gentleman has enumerated, and over which he says education is so widely diffused, are the most despotic in Europe. I expect the Ministers of Public Instruction have them educated in the principles of despotism, as the North no doubt, among other things, would specially instruct the southern people in the profound mysteries of her numerous isms. But let us criticise somewhat further this Phariseism, this claimed and boasted superiority of the North over the South in "enlightenment and Christianity." Education is certainly widely diffused over the North. Her people are greatly enlightened, but they set a great many false lights. Whence sprung all the isms, even in this nineteenth century, and within the age of this great reformer from Minnesota? I think the enlightened and Christian North is entitled to credit for them all. Mormonism, Millerism, spiritualism, free-loveism, and worst of all (if it should spread beyond Massachusetts) strong-minded-womanism, have sprung and spread over that highly civilized and Christian region. The poor, ignorant, uneducated South was incapable of producing such evidences of advancement and progress. But let us continue the contrast a little further.

Booth the assassin was not caught but bravely shot by a company of soldiers. He was brought to this city dead, in order that the reward for his arrest might be secured by proving his identity. After that, his entrails were torn out and thrown to the hogs, his head adorns some phrenological museum, his heart is preserved in spirits, his spinal column can be seen, which will display to the learned how much he must have suffered by the near approach of the bullet to the spinal marrow; the balance of his remains were deposited, God and our northern Secretary of War only know where. We know they were not handed over to his poor heart-broken mother so that she might exclaim over his grave in a burst of agony, "Would to God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!"

Mary Surratt was convicted, of course. She was tried by a court-martial. Her immediate execution was ordered. She entreated for four days to enable her to overcome the shock and the better to prepare her soul to meet her God. "Not an hour," thundered forth the voice from the War Department; "on with the gallows, the coffin, and the grave; the angels of heaven shall not rejoice over this repentant sinner." Agents of mercy sought the ear of higher authority, and probably a more merciful heart, but Preston King was janitor that day and they were excluded. Where is Preston King? Echo answers—where? She was thus executed speedily and notwithstanding application had been made in behalf of her heart-broken daughter for her remains, so that she might pour forth her sorrows, mingled with the gratitude and love which a daughter feels for a beloved mother, over her grave, those remains are still in the keeping of the War Department. Pontius Pilate delivered the body of Jesus to Joseph of Arimathea, but a worse than Pontius Pilate is here.

Is this a specimen of northern civilization and Christianity? These things were done by northern men without any denunciation by the great northern, enlightened, civilized, and Christian Republican party. Not one word have I read or heard from your Phillipses, your Beechers, your Cheevers, your Greeleys, or your strong-minded Massachusetts women, in rebuke of these most demoralizing acts, and as they touch upon everything which they think vicious, they probably do not disapprove of these transactions as coming in the way of Christian advancement and progress.

Let us look now at a southern picture. John Brown was arrested for a crime kindred to that of Booth. He was in the most formal manner tried, being allowed every facility for defense, no special test oath being urged to prevent the services of any advocate. He was legally and justly convicted to be hung. Between his conviction and execution ample time was given him for the settlement of his worldly affairs and for the preparation of his soul for eternity. After execution his remains were placed in a decent coffin and then handed over to his friends that they might observe such obsequies as they might think becoming. This took place among that "rude, illiterate, semi-civilized" people called Virginians, who had for their Governor at the time even Henry A. Wise. Look upon this picture and then on that. The North is very learned, but I do not think she has any Christianity or civilization to spare. What she has she had better retain for home consumption, and, as I hope, for improvement. She is more learned than the South, but which is the best educated?

I have thrown out these observations in the hope that I may induce the gentleman from Minnesota, and others who think like him, to withdraw his objection to a reunion based upon the uneducated condition of the southern people. But, sir, denunciation and revenge must, as was expected, have their fling against an honorable reunion. The resentment of the civilized and Christian North it is attempted to rouse against the unfortunate men of the South by epithets unbecoming the learned man or the patriot. They are denominated "murderers," "red-handed rebels," "conscious traitors." Those who use these epithets must see, if they will reflect, that they are not true. They must know that Jefferson Davis, Robert E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson, and the thousand others who engaged in the late contest, never could be answerable for the charge of murder and conscious treason. Stonewall Jackson rests in his grave, and your own eloquent Beecher has illustrated his character and rescued it from such an imputation. Time will defend the character of Davis and Lee. That their acts imposed upon them no consciousness of crime I have no doubt. The parting words of Jefferson Davis, in the presence of the Senate, breathe the strongest conviction of rectitude and a desire for peace, and to avoid bloodshed. I will read a short portion of them:

"I find in myself, perhaps, a type of the general feeling of my constituents toward yours. I am sure I feel no hostility to you, Senators from the North. I am sure there is not one of you, whatever sharp discussion there may have been between us, to whom I cannot now say, in the presence of my God, I wish you well; and such, I am sure, is the feeling of the people whom I represent toward those whom you represent. I therefore feel that I but express their desire when I say I hope, and they hope, for peaceful relations with you, though we must part. They may be mutually beneficial to us in future, as they have been in the past, if you so will it."

"In the course of my service here, associated at different times with a great variety of Senators, I see now around me some with whom I have served long; there have been points of collision; but whatever of offense there has been to me, I leave here; I carry with me no hostile remembrance. Whatever offense I have given which has not been redressed, or for which satisfaction has not been demanded, I have, Senators, in this hour of our parting, to offer you my apology for any pain which, in heat of discussion, I inflicted. I go hence unencumbered of the remembrance of any injury received, and having discharged the duty of making the only reparation in my power for any injury offered."

"Mr. President, and Senators, having made the announcement which the occasion seemed to me to require, it only remains for me to bid you a final adieu."

These thoughts and words are characteristic of the man, and stamp the charge of murderer and conscious treason with falsehood. How is it pretended that he is guilty of treason? His sovereign State seceded; he went with her and joined in defending her independence. There was a time when but few denied the right of secession. From the earliest period of our Government it has been asserted and claimed. Great and ruling parties have proclaimed it; States have sanctioned it; statesmen of the highest character all over the land have avowed it; commentators on your form of government have expounded it; and can any one in such a state of facts dare to denounce the act of secession as treason in a Government of free opinion? The doctrine of secession was born with the Constitution. It became a ruling principle of the ruling Democratic party, inserted in their platform from 1798 to the late war. New England formally determined to practice it on an occasion which she thought demanded it. Ohio, through her high officials and ablest statesmen, declared her determination to adopt it. Josiah Quincy sanctioned it. John Quincy Adams, in a most formal address before the Historical Society of New York, in 1839, most emphatically announced it as the true doctrine.

But, sir, I have alluded to this doctrine of secession, not with the view of defending it at this time, but a wish to introduce an authority connected with a fact which is known or recollected, I expect, to but few. William Rawle, formerly of Pennsylvania, was one of the ablest lawyers in this country. In 1824 he published a Commentary on the Constitution, a work frequently referred to as authority on the exposition of that instrument, not only at the bar, but by subsequent commentators. His first edition was soon exhausted, and in 1829 he published a new edition of his work, in the preface to which he states:

"In this edition the principles laid down in the first remain unaltered. The author has seen no reason for any change."

Thus, after having in the edition of 1824 laid down most clearly and emphatically the doctrine of the right of a State to secede from the Union, he restates the doctrine, after mature reflection and study in his second edition, declaring that "he had seen no reason for any change."

I would now, sir, merely refer you and this House to his able exposition on the subject as contained in the thirty-second chapter of his work. Now, this work of William Rawle was approved of and strongly indorsed by the ablest and profoundest lawyers. It was introduced as the text-book on constitutional law in the schools and colleges throughout the land, and during the Presidency of John Quincy Adams was adopted as the text-book on the Constitution in the Military Academy at West Point. It was the text-book when Jefferson Davis was there, and was placed in his hand as a cadet and student in that institution. He learned his first lessons of secession through the agency and teaching of this Government itself, and it may be his misfortune, but surely not his fault, that the lessons thus drilled into him have made a lasting impression on his mind. What possible justification can any man have, under such circumstances, in making the charge against him of being a "conscious traitor?" Would a common pedagogue chastise a pupil for having learned and understood his lesson too well? I can hardly believe that the devil himself, were he to place the Book of God into the hand of a fallen angel in order to subject it to perverted criticism, would punish him if he were to be convinced and turn Christian: What should be the conduct of this Government under such circumstances toward Jefferson Davis and those who from strong conviction of the correctness of their course acted with him? Justice and public honor demand their immediate release and restoration to their rights, the more especially as such a course cannot in the least conflict with public safety.

Away, then, with these charges that these people are murderers, red-handed rebels, and conscious traitors! They spring only from unreflecting excitement or from a depraved spirit of revenge, and with wise and considerate statesmen and patriots should never be allowed to interpose obstacles to the reunion which all such must now desire. Away, too, with the expectation that the southern people will ever degrade themselves by freely accepting conditions from the benefit of which you exclude their own chosen leaders! This should and will never be. Let the people sweep these obstacles aside, and as we were enemies in war, in peace let us be friends.

Mr. LE BLOND. If my friend from Maryland will permit me, I would like to ask him a single question. I understand from the argument of the gentleman from Maryland that he takes the position that the southern States lately in rebellion are out of the Union, and had a constitutional right to go out of the Union. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. HARRIS. They had a right to go out of the Union.

Mr. LE BLOND. A constitutional right?

Mr. HARRIS. They had the right in spite of the Constitution. It was a right that grew out of the sovereignty of the States.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then my distinguished friend from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] occupies the same position on this question that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and those who follow him occupy, that these States are out of the Union and had a right to go out.

I simply wish to say this, that the Democratic party differ with him in that respect. We do not believe that those States are out of the Union, or that they ever had the right to go out. We believe that nothing but successful revolution could ever carry them out of the Union. We disagree with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and his coadjutors on the other side of the House.

Mr. MOULTON. I desire here to deny the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND], that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] ever claimed or attempted to argue or admitted that the southern States had the right to go out of the Union.

Mr. LE BLOND. I assert that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and the other side of the House have on every occasion virtually sustained the doctrine that those States are out of the Union.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 269) to define the number and regulate the appointment of officers in the Navy, and for other purposes, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not desire to proceed with the discussion of this subject this evening; the hour is too late. But I would be glad, if it shall suit the convenience of the House, to submit some remarks to-morrow on the general question before the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will submit a motion to adjourn.

Mr. RAYMOND. I prefer to submit a motion to postpone this special order until to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. DAWES. Before the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] submits that motion, will he yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. RAYMOND. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I think the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] ought not to go unnoticed, for I think he has no authority for the statement he has made concerning the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, not now in his seat. I have never heard fall from the gentleman from Pennsylvania anything to warrant the statement that he now holds to the doctrine that the southern States had the right to go out of the Union. I differ quite widely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] as to the condition in which those States are at this time. But it is due to him in his absence that no member upon this floor should be permitted to so grossly misrepresent his opinions in that regard.

Now, I do not believe, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS], who has just taken his seat, that these southern States are out of the Union. But I do believe with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that they had no right to go out of the Union. If I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania aright—although I have no authority to speak for him and no ability to expound his views here—his opinion is that these States fought themselves as it were out of the Union; that as the result of the war between them and the Union, in which they were recognized as belligerents, they became, and are now, conquered territory; and that the United States being the conquerors have the authority to treat them as conquered territory. I believe that to be the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I differ in that opinion very widely from the gentleman. But I feel that I would be doing him great injustice if I were to sit here and permit the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] to go uncontradicted when he declares that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] ever held anywhere that under the Constitution the southern States had a right to go out of the Union.

The grand difference between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Maryland is this: the gentleman from Maryland holds that under the Constitution and by virtue of the Constitution itself any State had the right to secede from the Union, being itself the judge of the sufficiency of the cause for seceding.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say just here that the theory of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and the theory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] may vary, but the result in each case is the same. Both of those gentlemen vote to keep the southern States unrepresented by loyal men in this Congress and in the Union.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do. Mr. DAWES. Then the gentleman is quite as much in error in reference to my opinions as is the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] in regard to the opinions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS]. I am not one of those who are disposed by legislation or otherwise to keep any loyal man, representing a loyal constituency, out of a seat in this House to which he has been legally elected; and no vote of mine has ever contributed to that result.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I know very well that the gentleman from Massachusetts differs in theory with the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and therefore I wish to know how it is that they happen to vote together on all these questions; that they act in concert in preventing the representation in Congress of a portion of the States of this Union. Although the gentlemen differ in theory, they agree practically in declaring that those States shall not be represented upon this floor.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin, in his interrogatory to me, assumes what he has no right to assume—that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself, although, as he says, differing very widely in theory, are found together in practice. Whatever votes I have given here—I am not speaking, of course, for the gentleman from Pennsylvania—whatever votes I have given here, I fancy I am able, both to myself and my constituents as well as to the country, to reconcile them with the theory which I have advanced here on more than one occasion touching the right of representation on the part of the States lately in rebellion. I stand upon the record as long ago as the Thirty-Seventh Congress; and from that time to this I have put myself on the record more than once. In no particular do I desire at this moment and in this place to depart one iota from the principles laid down by me in the Louisiana election cases, and in the Virginia election cases. In my opinion, sir, we are fast coming to the very position assumed by me on those occasions, and adopted by the House of Representatives by large and controlling majorities.

I will add further, in this connection, that it seems to me it would be better for the gentleman from Wisconsin, before catechising me upon this point, to consider the harmony of his own action with that of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] who has just taken his seat. During the long service which I have had here with the gentleman from Wisconsin, I recollect no occasion on which he has differed in his votes (whatever may have been his position in debate) with the gentleman from Maryland. Now, for the gentleman from Wisconsin, occupying the position he does in relation to the gentleman from Maryland, always voting with him, to stand up here and catechise me upon this point, seems to savor of coolness, even on this hot day. [Laughter.]

I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I have conversed with him repeatedly upon these questions, and I have found him expressing opinions in entire accordance with the views which I entertain.

Mr. DAWES. Oh, no.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have asked him, and endeavored to persuade him, to present to this House a proposition to admit the southern States, not as States, but to allow their Representatives to come in as Representatives of their particular districts—to consider each candidate for admission simply with reference to himself and the constituency which he claims to represent and the loyalty of each. But the gentleman has never offered such a proposition to this House.

I wonder, and I have often wondered, why the gentleman, with the opinions which I know him to entertain, and which I have heard from his own mouth, has not, in his zeal for the restoration of the olden time, offered a proposition to admit members as they come here from the districts which they seek to represent, considering only the loyalty of the districts and the loyalty of the applicants themselves. When gentlemen come here as Representatives from the State of Tennessee—men admitted to be as loyal as any upon this floor—I wonder why the gentleman from Massachusetts, during seven long months, has never once voted for their admission or moved that they might be admitted as Representatives upon this floor.

I do not seek to catechise the gentleman; and the zeal which I have manifested and to which he has alluded has no reference to him. I do from the bottom of my heart desire that the peace which we have conquered by arms may be consummated by a full representation of all the States in the Halls of Congress. I am anxious for the result. I and other members on this side of the House have shown by the best evidence that we could give our readiness to vote for admitting these Representatives by districts without regard to anything else, whenever the proposition should be presented.

I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts we believe to-day upon this side that the Union has not been destroyed. We believe to-day that we have saved the Union and only need to have statesmen act in conjunction with the Army when the Union would be entirely restored.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts, with his distinguished ability and his great influence in the House, had moved in the early part of the session that those loyal Representatives should be admitted by districts, we might have had them here now from loyal districts in many of the southern States, which, according to the doctrine of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS], as well as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], are excluded at this hour from seats upon this floor.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Wisconsin has failed to answer my interrogatory why he has been found so entirely in harmony with the action of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not agree either with the gentleman from Maryland or the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLAINE. On what?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I differ with him on this question. I hold that these States are not out of the Union, and that they cannot get out.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Wisconsin knows very well that there is no disposition on my part to reflect on his past services in attempting to save the Union, to preserve it in all its integrity from the attempts of rebels to destroy it. I have no reason at all to attack him on his course. He sought to bring me upon the floor to reconcile my action with that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Now, I have to say, although the gentleman has failed to answer my question, there never has been a time in this House during this session when evidence was presented to me that any man came here a loyal and true Representative from a loyal and true district, I would not only have voted to admit him to a seat upon this floor, but, sir, would have welcomed him with open arms. There has never been a time when I have not been anxious for an opportunity to make the selection and the distinction between a loyal Representative of a loyal district in these southern States and those who come up here with blood-red hands as the Representatives of traitors.

Mr. Speaker, it has been my desire that the credentials of every man claiming to be a Representative should be presented to a proper committee, I cared not what committee it was, but a committee charged with the duty of making up the opinion of this House, on investigation, whether he came from a loyal constituency, represented in a State government republican in form and able to be supported and maintained by the loyal people thereof. And whenever it can be made to appear to me, on examination of the evidence—I do not care whether it be from the committee of fifteen, whether it be from a select committee, or from a standing committee of this House—that any man comes here from a State which has come out of this rebellion clothed in its right mind with such a republican form of government, in which domestic tranquillity has been restored and the loyal people, whether they be many or few, have been able to exercise the right of choosing a loyal man; I say whenever I am found under those circumstances creating any obstacle by vote or otherwise to his admission to a seat upon this floor, then the gentleman from Wisconsin or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] now standing up may hold me responsible for it.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly, sir.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have only to say this, that I have no wish to do the gentleman from Massachusetts injustice, and I am gratified, and I feel the country will be gratified, at the position which he states here to-day he now occupies. I hope he will keep on until the majority on his side shall be induced to act as he speaks.

What is the position of claimants for seats from the lately rebellious States? In what position, sir, do they find themselves when they come here? They are met with the resolution that the credentials of every one of them shall be referred without debate to the committee on reconstruction. I do not remember how that gentleman voted in reference to that question, whether he voted to commit every one of those credentials to that burial place or not, but it is enough for me to know that a majority have done it, and that the Committee of Elections, of which he is the able chairman, is stripped of its legitimate duty, and that good and bad men from the lately rebellious States are treated alike here. Men who have gone through the war in the Union Army are kept out of this House by the action of the majority of this House notwithstanding the gentleman's protest.

I ask the gentleman whether he voted to bury all those credentials or not. If he did not, then I say he is clearly exonerated from any complicity in preventing the representation of loyal men from the southern States.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I was about to state when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that—

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I thought the gentleman was through or I should not have interrupted him.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to know whether my colleague means to say that he is in favor of the admission of a loyal Representative from any district of the eleven States recently in rebellion when he is satisfied that a majority of the people of that district are loyal to the Government, without regarding the institutions of the State from which the individual claiming to be a Representative comes, regardless of the fact whether they have established laws and framed institutions which secure the rights of all men without regard to race or color. Because if that be the position of my colleague, I, as one member of this House, as one citizen of Massachusetts, and as the Representative of a portion of her people, beg to dissent from that position.

• Mr. DAWES. If my colleague had not been quite so anxious to find a point of difference with his colleague, as I am afraid he was, he would have been entirely satisfied, I think, with the position I was about to state. I was upon the point of telling the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL], when he interrupted me, just what, when Congress assembled in December last, I desired it to do, and just what I think it ought to have done. It does not differ much from what was done, but so far as it did differ I regret it, because I believe it led to mischief, and was the beginning of dissensions that are fraught with evil.

Sir, the Constitution of the United States imposes this obligation upon the United States, not upon this House, not upon the Senate, not upon the Executive, but upon all three—"the United States" is the term used—namely, to guaranty a republican form of government to each and every one of the States of this Union; and when the eleven States, after having, in the terrible commotions and civil war which has been upon them, upheaved and overturned all the civil institutions within their borders, and blotted out all the civil governments there; after having been at war with this Government for four long years, came to lay down their arms and surrender to this Government, and then went to work to erect upon the ruins new forms of government and to adopt new constitutions, it was the duty of every one of those States, in my opinion, to present its new form of constitution to the President of the United States, and it was his duty to have laid that form of constitution before the Congress of the United States, to the end that the three branches representing the Government of the United States—the two Houses and the President—might have those constitutions officially before them and pass judgment upon them whether they were republican or not.

I regretted exceedingly that in his first communication to Congress the President had not laid each and all of those forms of government, whatever they were, and all the papers and evidences accompanying them, before Congress. The gravity and importance of the subject would, in my opinion, have required the reference of those constitutions, with all the papers and all the evidence accompanying them, thus laid before the two Houses, to a joint committee, and it would have been the duty of that committee to have inquired, first, whether those constitutions were republican in form; secondly, whether they were the free act of the loyal people of the States from which they emanated; and thirdly, whether domestic tranquillity was so far restored among that loyal people that this republican form of government, its own free act, could be maintained by that people against domestic violence. As to what constitutes a republican form of government my colleague will not find me differing essentially with him. We do not materially differ upon that point. But, sir, whenever a joint committee of these two bodies should have pronounced, upon a faithful, deliberate, and careful examination of all the facts and circumstances, that the State of Tennessee, North Carolina, or Arkansas, or any other State, had set up such a form of government, that it was the free act of the loyal people of that State, and that domestic tranquillity had been so far restored that such government could be maintained, and such report, in fulfillment of the constitutional obligation of guarantying republican forms of government to the States, should become the judgment of the two Houses and the President, that is, of the United States, then any loyal man elected as a Representative under such a State government, from a loyal constituency, would be entitled to admission, and I would like to ask my colleague or any other member of the House upon what ground of constitutional right he or I could object to that man taking his seat here.

Meantime, it would have better comported with what I thought ought to have been done if, while the constitutions of these States and the papers accompanying them had gone, as I have indicated, to a joint committee, the credentials of those claiming to be Representatives had been referred to the appropriate committee under the rules of this House. Because, sir, the Constitution is just as explicit upon that point as it is in imposing upon us to guaranty a republican form of government to each State. It declares just as explicitly that this House and the other branch of Congress shall keep within itself, and under its own exclusive control, the credentials of those claiming to be members thereof. But, had I been a member of the committee to which such credentials were referred, I would not have taken action upon them until I was satisfied upon evidence that all the conditions I have indicated had been fulfilled in the States from which the Representatives claimed to come.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to ask my colleague how it can be possible that a community can be authorized, through any organization, to issue credentials to a man which can be regarded by this House or by a committee of this House as "credentials" until the right of that community to be considered as a State within the Union has been recognized by the constituted authorities of the Government? How, therefore, could it have been consistent or proper for one committee of Congress in one room to have been considering the right of South Carolina to be represented at all, and another committee considering in another room credentials issued by the so-called authorities of South Carolina, which had never been recognized by the Government?

Mr. DAWES. In the first part of my colleague's proposition I agree entirely, to wit, that it is impossible for any one to come here and be entitled to admission as a Representative from any community until that community has become a State of this Union. But, sir, he and I differ entirely upon the question of the right of any of these States to representation. I believe in their right from the beginning. I also believe in their incapacity, growing out of the rebellion. They have always been States, but States disorganized, and therefore unable to elect Representatives; and the question with me is one of fact, not of legal right; whether they are capable of being represented, not whether they are entitled to representation. By their own folly and rebellion they have placed themselves in a position where they have an incapacity of representation, that is, an inability to elect, and it is perfectly consistent that the credentials of a man claiming to be elected should be referred to the appropriate committee, while another committee should pass upon the grave question of the condition of the State and the character of its organic law. When they shall stand up, erect, and clothed in their right mind, then they will be capable of electing Representatives.

But, sir, it is idle for my colleague and myself to enter into any discussion upon this question. The practical result would be the same under his theory and under mine. He says that when they are capable of electing Representatives they are entitled to do so. I say their title has always been good, but they cannot exercise it because they are in rebellion, or not yet sufficiently out of it, and that until they have so far restored domestic tranquillity as to obey the law, conform themselves to it, and erect and maintain a State government republican in form, they are not capable of electing Representatives.

Sir, is it necessary for every State in this Union that changes its form of government to be readmitted or re-recognized as a State before it can send Representatives here? The State of Rhode Island changed its form of government in the most radical particular. The constituted authorities of the United States did not insist upon it that the Representatives chosen under the new State government of Rhode Island should stand at the door knocking until that new State government was recognized. They assumed that the State of Rhode Island was capable of electing Representatives. There had been no state of things calling for an investigation. Not so with these States.

But, sir, I am occupying much more time than I intended. Let me only add that this question is entirely independent of what constitutional amendments the exigencies of the times may demand.

Mr. LE BLOND. Allow me a word.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. LE BLOND. The gentleman has set himself up here to some extent as the defender of the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. DAWES. Not in the least. I have only sought to defend him from misrepresentation.

Mr. LE BLOND. Very good; then the gentleman does seek to defend him. Now, I wish to know this: if, as is claimed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] does not assert that these States have the right to go out of the Union, and we know that they have been unsuccessful in their attempt at revolution, how under heaven are they now out of the Union? If they are not out of the Union, then why treat them as States out of the Union and deny them representation here, although they are out of the Union neither by virtue of the Constitution nor by successful revolution?

Mr. DAWES. I have only to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] that I never assumed to defend the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that these States were even conquered Territories. All I assumed to do was to state his position correctly, as I understood it, and not as the gentleman from Ohio misstated it. It is not for me to defend that position, for I told him in all frankness that I did not believe with him.

I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. DELANO. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion to allow me to submit a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly, I will withdraw it.

DUTY ON FOREIGN WOOL.

Mr. DELANO, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the present duty on imported wools affords no protection to the American wool-grower and yields very little revenue to the Government; and whereas an expectation prevails that the present duty is to be increased during the present session of Congress; and whereas this expectation is causing large importations for future consumption, whereby the revenue of the Government from this source is being materially affected, and the present clip of wool is being purchased by speculators at prices which do not remunerate the wool-grower, in consequence of the delay in reforming the present duty:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to give the subject immediate attention, and report by bill at the earliest possible day.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed, without amendment, a joint resolution (S. R. No. 87) to provide for the payment of bounty to certain Indian regiments.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 674) to establish additional offices for the assay of gold and silver, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 148) making an appropriation for the repair of the Potomac bridge.

HOMESTEADS IN SOUTHERN LAND STATES.

Mr. KIRKWOOD submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 85) for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, having met, have, after full and free conference, agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to the respective Houses as follows:

1. That the Senate recede from the first amendment of the Senate, striking out on page 1 all after the words "sixty-four" in line eight to the word "and" in line twelve, and that the words thus restored be amended by inserting on page 1, line eight, after the word "that" the words "until the expiration of two years from and after the passage of this act."

2. That the Senate recede from the second amendment of the Senate.

3. That the House agree to the third amendment of the Senate with an amendment, as follows: that at the end of the second section of the bill, as the same passed the Senate, shall be added the following proviso: "Provided, That until the 1st day of January, 1867, any person applying for the benefit of this act, shall, in addition to the oath hereinbefore required, also make oath that he has not borne arms against the United States or given aid and comfort to its enemies."

S. J. KIRKWOOD,
HENRY WILSON,
GARRETT DAVIS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.
GEORGE W. JULIAN,
JOHN H. RICE,
S. E. ANCONA,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the bill read, in order to understand the report.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I can explain, in a very few minutes, what the report of the committee of conference is. It will be remembered by the Senator from Nevada that the bill, as it was passed by the House of Representatives, limited the homestead in the States named to eighty acres. When the bill was under consideration in the Senate that provision was changed so as to extend the homestead to one hundred and sixty acres. That was one of the points of disagreement between the two Houses. The committee of conference have agreed to permit the restriction of eighty acres to remain for a period of two years from the passage of the act, and then we go back to the one hundred and sixty acre system. The Senator will remember that the Senate also made a small amendment in regard to timber lands, from which we now agree to recede.

The Senate added another section, the effect of which was to repeal the requirements of the act of 1862, which required persons applying for the benefit of the homestead law to make oath that they had not borne arms against the United States. To that, also, the House disagreed. The committee of conference have adjusted that disagreement by providing that until the 1st of January next the oath shall be taken, but that after the 1st of January next that requirement shall cease. The reason that controlled the committee in doing this, I will briefly state. It is intended by some who supported this bill to allow the freedmen in those States to have the benefit of the homestead law. It is known that much the larger portion of them now have contracted for their labor during the current year, and those contracts will expire on the 1st day of January next; and then, and not till then, will they be prepared to avail themselves of the benefits of the law. It was intended, therefore, to continue the requirement that persons should make oath that they had not borne arms against the Government of the United States until the time when the freedmen will be in a position to avail themselves of the benefit of this law. On that basis the committee of conference agreed.

Mr. STEWART. Then I understand the Senator to say that the section reported by the Committee on Public Lands and adopted by the Senate, repealing the requirement requiring the taking of that oath in making entries of public lands generally, stands after the 1st of January next.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes, sir; until the 1st of January the oath remains as it has been; that is, the person availing himself of the law must swear that he has not borne arms against the Government of the United States; but on the 1st of January that requirement ceases and any man can then enter the public lands.

Mr. STEWART. I will state that my principal reason for making the inquiry was that the effect of this bill, as originally passed by the House of Representatives, was to withdraw from public sale and from preëemption the lands in several southern States, and to permit them to be entered only under the homestead law, which law prevented any one who had borne arms against the Government of the United States from entering the public lands. In this shape it prevented such persons from either buying public lands or entering them. Consequently we regarded it as a matter of considerable importance that the bill should be so modified that the rebels might go upon the public lands and get to work. I regret that the repeal of that clause does not take effect immediately, so that they may enter the public lands in the West at once. A great many have removed into the western country, and I am anxious that they shall raise their own potatoes and corn, and feed themselves, because I believe that any person who is worthy to live should be permitted to support himself, and not be a pauper; but as by this report the existing restriction upon raising their own provisions is not to be continued, and they are not to remain a charge upon the country as paupers after the 1st of January next, I have no objection to the adoption of the report. As I understood it at first, I thought the committee of conference had stricken out our provision, so as to prevent them from going on the public lands altogether.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 674) to establish additional offices for the assay of gold and silver, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask a moment's time of the Senate to make—what I think I have never made before—a personal explanation; and that not on my own account, but to relieve a high officer of the Government who seems to be held responsible for my sins of commission and omission. In the New York Tribune, the other day, there was an article, in which the Secretary of the Treasury was accused of being insincere in his efforts to bring about specie payments; and a part of the evidence produced by the editor was that I was the organ of the Treasury Department, and that I was in favor of limiting the power of the Secretary to reduce the currency. I paid no attention to it, although it is unjust to the Secretary; but I see in this morning's National Intelligencer the article of the Tribune republished with comments. I will read a short extract from the article in the Tribune:

"Now, Mr. SHERMAN is the well-known author of the proposition forbidding any redemption of our greenbacks at a rate exceeding ten millions per month, that is, forbidding the Secretary to redeem at his convenience the Government's explicit promises to pay. And we are by no means alone in our understanding that Mr. SHERMAN is the organ of the Treasury Department. If this be a mistake, let us know it explicitly."

I have the satisfaction to inform the editor of the Tribune, and everybody else, that I am not the organ of the Treasury Department, directly or indirectly; and I state it "explicitly." The only points that have ever been brought up in the Senate during this session in regard to the policy of the Secretary was on the two loan bills, one of which I opposed and am still opposed to. I think it was an unwise measure, because it gives to the Secretary of the Treasury too much control over the finances of the country. It is true I proposed in the Senate the limitation of his power over the currency, and I still oppose this, but to this the Secretary agreed. The other is the measure referred to, the funding bill, which the Tribune seems to be in favor of. I can state that Mr. McCulloch desired the passage of the funding bill very much, and he is still in favor of it; but he is not willing to undertake the serious task of reducing the rate of interest in this country without the support of Congress.

The article of the Intelligencer to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate accuses Congress, substantially, with thwarting the Secretary of the Treasury and defeating his measures to bring about the resumption of specie payments. I feel bound to say that Congress has never thwarted the Secretary of the Treasury in anything of the kind. On the contrary, it passed a bill two months ago which gave him more power than was ever conferred on any Secretary of the Treasury. The delay in acting upon the funding bill arises out of a difference of opinion as to the provisions contained in that bill. I hope at an early day to get a vote of the Senate upon it. I feel bound to say that Congress has always given to the Secretary every power he has asked, except those in the pending bill, and this I hope will yet receive the sanction of the Senate. I think it is not necessary for me to say anything further, except that I hope the Secretary of the Treasury will not be held responsible for my sins of commission or omission, and I do not propose to be held responsible for his.

COUNTIES OF BERKELEY AND JEFFERSON.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 120) to extend to the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, of West Virginia, the provisions of the act approved July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," was read twice by its title.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I respectfully ask that that resolution may have present consideration. It was reported in the House of Representatives yesterday morning and passed there unanimously, and I have brought it to the notice of the Finance Committee, who are willing that I shall take this course. It proposes simply to enable the Quartermaster General and the Commissary General of Subsistence to come to the conclusion that these counties are part of the State of West Virginia. The law that it is intended to correct, so far as these counties are concerned, now reads, "that all claims of loyal citizens in the States not in rebellion for quartermaster's stores," &c., and because these two counties were formerly a part of the State of Virginia they insist upon treating them as parts of a State in rebellion. The law which it is intended to give these counties the benefit of only proposes to allow these officers to pay for official receipts given for property taken or purchased for the use of the Government." I would be very much pleased if the resolution could have present consideration.

I am aware that there is a bill pending in the Senate which proposes to extend the same favor to all the States, the States that have been in rebellion as well as those that have not; but whether these counties would specifically come in under that or not I cannot say. At any rate, at this stage of the session I am not sure that that bill will pass. I am not sure that it would pass even if it were to come up to-day. This resolution is simply to relieve these two counties so as to enable these officers to give what the Senate will certainly agree is a fair construction to the law of 1864, that they are counties in a loyal State. I would be pleased if the Senate would permit the consideration of the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. If that subject is likely to occupy any time I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. It will take but a moment. If it should occupy any time I will let it go over.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which proposes to extend the provisions of the act of Congress of July 4, 1864, to "restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims," &c., to the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, in the State of West Virginia.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 492) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under the authority of law, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House, agree to the conference asked for on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the committee of conference on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. CHANDLER, MORRILL, and RIDDLE were appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMBOY AND TRAVERSE BAY RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 243) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some point on or near Traverse Bay, in the State of Michigan, and for the completion of said road. The amendment of the House was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and to insert the following as a substitute:

That the time limited by the fourth section of an act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1856, for the completion of the railroad from Amboy, by Hillsdale and Lansing, to some point on or near Traverse Bay, shall be, and hereby is, revived and extended for the period of seven years from and after the 3d day of June, 1866; and that said grant shall continue and remain in full force and effect for and during that period as if it had been so provided in said fourth section of said act of June 3, 1856: Provided, That the Amboy, Lansing, and Traverse Bay Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, shall forfeit all right to said grant, or any part thereof, which it may now have, or which may hereafter be conferred upon it by the Legislature of the State of Michigan, if, and whenever, the said company shall fail, in whole or in part, fully and completely to perform any of the following conditions, that is to say: 1st. To clear, grub, and grade twenty consecutive miles of the road-bed of said road between Owosso and Saginaw City, so that the same shall be in readiness for the ties and iron by the 1st day of February, 1867. 2d. To fully complete said road from Owosso to Saginaw City, so that the same shall be in readiness for the running of trains by the 1st day of November, 1867. 3d. To fully complete in like manner twenty miles of said road in each and every year after the said 1st day of November, 1867, and to fully complete the entire road by the time limited by this act: And provided further, That in case of failure of said Amboy, Lansing, and Traverse Bay Railroad Company to perform any of the above conditions by the respective times limited therefor, the Legislature of the State of Michigan may, at its first session after any such failure, confer the said grant upon some other railroad corporation or corporations, upon such terms and conditions as the Legislature may see fit to carry out the purposes of the said act of June 3, 1856; and when so conferred such corporation or corporations shall be entitled to have and enjoy all of the said grant which shall not then have been lawfully disposed of, to the same extent and in the same manner and for the same purposes as if the same had been originally conferred upon such corporation or corporations. And any such railroad corporation or corporations, whether now organized or hereafter to be organized, upon which said grant may be so conferred, in whole or in part, may receive the same without prejudice to any land grant or other rights or franchises previously required. But in no case shall such corporation or corporations be entitled to receive more than ten sections of land to the mile for that portion of said road which may be consolidated in accordance with the provisions of this act: And provided further, That if the Legislature shall in any such case of failure so confer said grant as above provided, the said lands, or so much thereof as shall then remain not lawfully disposed of, shall be subject to the disposal and future control of said Legislature, as provided in section three of said act of June 3, 1856, until the expiration of the time limited by this act; but in case the said Legislature shall in such case fail to confer the grant, then the said lands shall revert to the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Flint and Pere Marquette Railroad Company may change the western terminus of its road to some point on Lake Michigan at or south of Grand Traverse Bay, and any railroad corporations having a right to the respective land grants specified in the said act of June 3, 1856, located in the lower peninsula of the State of Michigan, may unite and contract with each other or with any other railroad corporation or corporations for the construction and operation of a single line of road for any portion of their routes, without prejudice to any land grants or other rights or franchises previously required. And any and all such corporations are hereby authorized to change the location of their lines of road so far as may be necessary for the purpose of such consolidation, but not so as to change their respective termini otherwise than is authorized by this act. And whenever any change of terminus or location of line is made as provided for in this act, the corporation or corporations making such change, shall file in the General Land Office new maps definitely showing such change and the new line of road adopted: Provided, That the road mentioned in the first section of this act shall run on the east side of Saginaw river, and that the principal depot shall be located in the northern portion of the plat of Saginaw City, so as best to accommodate the cities of Saginaw and East Saginaw.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the lands granted by the said act of June 3, 1856, to aid in the construction of the railroad described in the first section of this act shall be disposed of only in the following manner, that is to say, when the Governor of the State of Michigan shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that ten or more consecutive miles of said road have been completed in a good and substantial manner, as a first-class railroad, stating definitely the commencement and termination of each completed portion of said road, and the corporation or corporations so entitled to lands on account thereof, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause patents for lands for such completed portion of said road to be issued to said corporation or corporations: Provided, That none of said lands shall be acquired or so patented for any portion of said road so completed south of the intersection of said road with the Detroit and Milwaukee railway until the whole of said road north of said intersection shall have been completed, and the land therefor patented as aforesaid: And provided further, That the road mentioned in the first section of this act shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, and shall transport free from toll or other charges all property, troops, and munitions of war belonging to the same.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I move an amendment to the amendment of the House, in the second proviso to the first section, after the words "of the State of Michigan may" to insert "if in session, and if not then." The object of the amendment is to give the Legislature of Michigan, in case this company fails to comply with the condition stated in the amendment, the right to transfer the lands granted to some other company in order to insure the early construction of the road. It is very clearly for the public benefit. Our Legislature does not meet except once in two years, and if the amendment should pass in its present form our Legislature cannot act on the question until two years after next January.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is another case precisely like the one which came the other day from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOWARD. It is the same.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is that bill printed yet?

Mr. HOWARD. It was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understand this bill comes from the House now. Is it from the committee? I want to understand, if it is the same bill, how we get it twice over.

Mr. POMEROY. A bill passed the Senate and was sent to the House of Representatives. This is a substitute for the bill that we passed. As an amendment to our bill, the House passed this substitute and sent it back. Now the Senator from Michigan proposes to amend the substitute, as I understand, and send it back again to the House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know what the bill was we had the other day.

Mr. CHANDLER. This is the identical one.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not see how it gets here a second time.

Mr. CHANDLER. It has laid on the table since.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand this to be a substitute.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is manifest that we do not know what we are legislating about, and I object to this mode of doing business. I do not know but that this may be all perfectly correct; but here comes from the House of Representatives an entire substitute for a bill which the Senate has passed without anybody in the Senate knowing what the substitute is, and without its having gone to any committee whatever; and the Senator from Michigan proposes to amend that substitute, and asks us to pass it. I object to that mode of doing business, and I move that this bill be referred to the proper committee, the Committee on Public Lands, that they may examine it and report upon it, so that we shall have something upon which to base our action.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the reference will not be made. This bill has undergone a very thorough examination in the House of Representatives, and the entire Michigan delegation is united upon the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that it is not in order to refer to the proceedings of the other House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before voting on the proposition to refer this bill with the amendment, I should like the Senator from Michigan to explain in what respect the House of Representatives has modified the bill as it was passed by the Senate. I will state to the Senate that this was the subject of a good deal of controversy before the Committee on Public Lands. There are rival or disagreeing interests in the State of Michigan in regard to this road; and I should like to know what the amendment is. Perhaps it is not necessary to refer it to the committee if there is no material change.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is an entire substitute.

Mr. HOWARD. This amendment was ordered to be printed the day before yesterday, but it has not yet been printed, or at least not distributed among the members of the Senate. I suggest that it be laid aside for the present until it is printed and distributed among us, so that we know more accurately what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending motion is to refer the bill and amendment to the Committee on Public Lands; and the motion to lay the bill aside will not take precedence of that motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not desire to press the motion to refer if it can be understood that we are to have an opportunity to know what the measure is. I think it had better be referred; but if the Senator from Michigan objects to that, I have no objection to his motion to lay it aside and have it printed. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that this is a bill extending the time within which to complete this road. There is no objection to the general purpose of the bill. It is a proposition that all Senators will vote for. The only question is one of detail to adjust some conflicting interests in the districts in Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD. That is all there is about it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no grant of lands.

Mr. HOWARD. No.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But because of the difficulties in constructing railroads for a few years past this bill extends the time for some years. It is very important that this bill should not be defeated. It ought to pass in some form, because the companies are now ready as I understand to go on and build the road. It is a very important road, connecting Saginaw with the capital of the State, and thence extending up in a northern direction. If the bill made a grant of land it would be a different question; but it is really a question of local interest to the people in that portion of the country.

Mr. COWAN. I have certainly no objection to the bill; my objection to this course of proceeding is that I know nothing of the bill. It is utterly impossible to keep up with the business by a personal examination of everything. I follow the committees, as a general rule, on trust. When they examine and report a bill the presumption is that it is free from defect. If this bill is simply to be printed and distributed around among us, containing new matter which has not been heretofore submitted to any committee, I think that course is improper, and I think the Senator from Illinois should have insisted upon his motion to refer it, and let the committee report.

Mr. HOWARD. Under the circumstances I will withdraw the amendment which I proposed, by the consent of the Senate, and suffer the bill to pass.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not consent to pass it for one, certainly, if that is the object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to amend the amendment being withdrawn, the question recurs on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I renew my motion to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands. Now, I desire to say a word in reply to the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Indiana tells us that the bill ought to pass, and that it is a matter about which there should be no controversy.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not say that this substitute from the House ought to pass, for I have not read it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator has not read the substitute, and the House of Representatives thought it so important that they would not agree to our bill, but they sent us a new bill, an entire substitute for it; and now we are asked to pass it without anybody here having seen it or having read it. I protest against this mode of doing business, and I move that the bill and amendment be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I hope the Senate will take that course.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up, for the purpose of fixing a day for its consideration, the bill (H. R. No. 613) to continue in force and amend an act to establish a bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes. It is important to act upon this measure, and I hope the Senate will indulge me in this request.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the consideration of this bill be postponed until Tuesday next, and be made the special order for that day, at one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that motion if it is understood that I shall be at liberty on that day to call up the Army appropriation bill. It has been understood that that day would be devoted to finishing the Army appropriation bill and getting it out of the way.

Mr. WILSON. I think we can arrange that matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; then I have no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up Senate bill No. 317, to amend the Pacific railroad act.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 317) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864.

It proposes to authorize the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, (now constructing a road from the Missouri river so as to unite with the Union Pacific railroad at the one hundredth meridian of west longitude, or at such point westwardly as may be deemed best upon actual survey,) to designate the general route of their road, and to file a map thereof, as now required by law, at any time before the 1st day of October, 1866; and upon the filing of the map, showing the general route of the road, the lands along the entire line thereof, so far as the same may be designated, are to be reserved from sale by order of the Secretary of the Interior.

The Committee on the Pacific Railroad had reported the bill with several amendments, the first of which was to strike out the following words, after the word "division" in line three:

Now constructing a road from the Missouri river so as to unite with the Union Pacific railroad at the one hundredth meridian of west longitude, or at such point westwardly as may be deemed best upon actual survey by the said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten to strike out "October" and insert "December."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following proviso, after the word "Interior," in line fifteen:

Provided, That said company shall be entitled to only the same amount of the bonds of the United States to aid in the construction of their line of railroad and telegraph as they would have been entitled to if they had connected their said line with the Union Pacific railroad on the one hundredth degree of longitude, as now required by law: And provided further, That said company shall connect their line of railroad and telegraph with the Union Pacific railroad, but not at a point more than fifty miles westwardly from the meridian of Denver, in Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as additional section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Union Pacific Railroad Company, with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior, without reference to the one hundredth meridian of longitude, are hereby authorized to continue their road westward, according to the best and most practicable route, in a continuous and unbroken line until they shall meet and connect with the Central Pacific railroad; and the Central Pacific Railroad Company are hereby authorized to continue their road eastward, according to the best and most practicable route, in a continuous and unbroken line until they shall meet and connect with the Union Pacific railroad: Provided, That the words "continuous and unbroken line" shall not be held to include necessary bridges and tunnels on the routes of said roads.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not know that I understand this precisely. There is a confusion of terms, to my mind, in the names of these roads. It looks to me as if this section would have the effect of legalizing the building of two railroads entirely across the country. The section first speaks of "the Union Pacific Railroad Company." What company is that?

Mr. HOWARD. The route of the Union Pacific Railroad Company commences on the one hundredth meridian of longitude and goes westwardly until it shall unite with the California Central Pacific Railroad Company on the eastern boundary of California, or at some point east of that boundary. That is what we call the main stem.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then I see a provision in regard to "the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division." What is that?

Mr. HOWARD. That is known as the Kansas branch. It is operating under a charter granted by the State of Kansas, and to that company the Government has granted land and subsidy to enable them to construct the road.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should be glad to have this section explained: "that the Union Pacific Railroad Company, with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior, without reference to the one hundredth meridian of longitude, are hereby authorized to continue their road westward according to the best and most practicable route" "until they shall meet and connect with the Central Pacific railroad." And the Central Pacific Railroad Company are authorized to come eastward to connect with the Union Pacific Railroad Company. Are they not already authorized to do that?

Mr. HOWARD. I will state to the Senator from Iowa what the law is on that subject. By the act of 1864, amending the Pacific railroad charter of 1862, it was provided: "that should the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California"—that is, the company chartered by California with rights and privileges to enable it to construct a railroad in that State to the eastern boundary of California—"complete their line to the eastern line of the State of California before the line of the Union Pacific Railroad Company shall have been extended westward so as to meet the line of said first-named company, said first-named company may extend their line of road eastward one hundred and fifty miles on the established route, so as to meet and connect with the line of the Union Pacific road."

The Senator will perceive that by this clause of the amendatory act of 1864 the right is given to the California Central Pacific Railroad Company to extend its line into the Territories of the United States to a distance of one hundred and fifty miles east of the eastern line of the State of California, but not beyond one hundred and fifty miles; there they will have to stop their road. The object of this provision is to enable the California company to proceed eastwardly with that line of railroad until it shall meet the main stem in its progress westward, although it may be necessary, perhaps, for the California company to build their road for a distance of more than one hundred and fifty miles east of the eastern line of the State of California. In short, it is to open a competition between these two companies, the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the California Central Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. GRIMES. A connection, you mean.

Mr. HOWARD. A competition to see which shall build the road the fastest; but they are required to meet and form one continuous line.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But the first clause of the section says that the Union Pacific Railroad Company, with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior, without reference to the one hundredth meridian of longitude, may continue their road westward according to the best and most practicable route. What does that language mean?

Mr. RAMSEY. They are now required to meet the main line at the one hundredth meridian. This is to allow them to go to Denver.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understand that the one hundredth meridian line is the initial point. That is the eastern terminus.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator wishes to strike out that language I have no particular objection. I see, however, that the Senator from California is now in his seat, and perhaps he had better give this matter his attention.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. In the latter part of the section, the Central Pacific Railroad Company are authorized to continue their road eastwardly according to the best and most practicable route. That, I suppose, is without reference to the route selected by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, or approved by the Secretary of the Interior. They may go where they please without asking the authority of Congress or the Secretary of the Interior or anybody.

Mr. HOWARD. They are bound by the provisions of the law, of course, and they are required to meet and connect with the Union line and form a continuous line. There is no uncertainty about it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It looks to me very much as if the effect of all this would be to leave the location of this line wholly outside of the control of Congress, the Secretary of the Interior, or anybody else except the companies who may be engaged in building it.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the House joint resolution (No. 52) to provide for the expenses attending the exhibition of the products of the industry of the United States at the Exposition at Paris in 1867.

Mr. MORRILL. Is not the District of Columbia business the regular order?

Mr. HOWARD. I suggest to my friend from Maine that we shall probably get through with this railroad bill in a few minutes, if he will allow us to proceed. I leave it to him entirely.

Mr. MORRILL. That does not seem to be the difficulty.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we might take the vote in a very few minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand the order called up to be the resolution that the Senator from New York has charge of. I dislike extremely to make a motion to lay that resolution aside, but I feel compelled to do so. It will be remembered that yesterday the Senate passed a resolution assigning to-day for the consideration of the business of the District of Columbia. I know the business of this District has been, I hardly ought to say neglected, but has been accumulating on our hands here for a long time, and I have been seeking an opportunity most vigilantly for its disposition. It was the sense of the Senate yesterday that we should occupy to-day in that business, and although I am reluctant to antagonize with the unfinished business, I think it my duty on the whole to submit the question to the judgment of the Senate whether I shall go on or the Senator from New York, and for that purpose I submit a motion that the pending question and all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the business indicated in the resolution of yesterday.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Maine will not press that motion. I am persuaded, from what I know from the correspondence that has taken place in reference to this Paris Exhibition, that there is no one measure pending before Congress which is suffering so much from delay as this and upon which it is so important to have speedy action as on this measure. I will say to the Senator from Maine that if this joint resolution in relation to the Paris Exhibition should take more than an hour, I will not struggle against his bringing up his special order; but I hope he will allow action to be taken now upon this unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed with the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 8, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARRIS, [to Mr. MORRILL.] You had better withdraw your motion.

Mr. MORRILL. My object was to get the sense of the Senate, which we do not seem to obtain; and with the understanding that the honorable Senator will yield to the District business if his joint resolution gives rise to discussion, I will withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate cannot proceed at present. There is no quorum voting; and no business can be done until a quorum appears.

Mr. TRUMBULL. To get out of the difficulty, I suggest a recount. There is a quorum in the Senate. I ask for a second division.

The question being again put, the motion of Mr. MORRILL was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 12, noes 13.

Mr. CONNESS subsequently submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill No. 317; which was received informally and ordered to be printed.

PARIS UNIVERSAL EXHIBITION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) to provide for the expenses attending the exhibition of the products of industry of the United States at the Exhibition at Paris in 1867, the pending question being upon the amendment of Mr. HARRIS, to insert after line fifteen of the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations the following words:

Secondly, to provide additional accommodations in the park, $25,000 in coin.

Mr. GRIMES. We were informed yesterday by the Senator from New York that this appropriation was asked to erect a building in Paris. The question is fairly and squarely presented to us, and I want to have the sense of the Senate as to whether we have the power, and if we have the power, whether it is proper, to make such an investment as that in real estate in the French empire. I therefore ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Just before the adjournment of the Senate yesterday evening, I rose to make an inquiry or two of the Senator from New York [Mr. HARRIS] who has this resolution in charge. I understood from him, and was surprised to understand, that the rules which will govern this Exhibition are such as to exclude all the States acting as States of this Union, and also citizens, from presenting any articles for exhibition as citizens, and that no authority or person of the United States can be received except the Government of the United States. I want to inquire of the Senator who established this regulation; whether it was upon any consultation with the Government of the United States; whether in any way we acquiesced in such an arrangement and understanding as that; whether it is an arrangement made by the Government of France, or whether it is an understanding agreed upon among all the European authorities? If we have not been consulted at all, it is rather a singular proceeding; and if we have been consulted and agreed to an arrangement which excludes the States and citizens, and only allows the country to be represented through the action of Congress, I am surprised that we should have come to any such understanding, in view of the fact that the authority of the General Government to appropriate its money for such a purpose is, to say the least of it, very questionable. I should like to know from the Senator, by what authority these regulations which exclude the States of this Union, which are very much more important than many of the States of the German confederacy, which

I understand are provided for in the Fair, have been established.

Mr. HARRIS. The way I understand this matter is, that in the spring of 1865 the Emperor of France issued a sort of decree or proclamation inviting the different Governments of the world to unite in this great Exhibition. This communication was made to the different Governments, and among others to the Government of the United States, and it is only that Government that can be represented in this Exhibition. Congress in January last accepted that invitation according to the terms of the proposition made by the Emperor of France. We agreed that we would go into this Exhibition. No individual can be represented there as an individual, and no State; but the Government represents its citizens, and the Government of the United States must represent the States. In conformity with the resolution passed in January last a commissioner general was appointed residing in France. Fortunately, we have been able to secure the services of a very valuable, intelligent, and wealthy gentleman residing there, who is admirably adapted for this duty, and that, too, without compensation, who is taking care of the interests of all the States, but in the name of the General Government. So, too, the General Government has appointed an agent residing in the city of New York, who is engaged in receiving applications of producers, inventors, and those who desire to take part in this Exhibition, and who has received, to use his own expression, an immense number of applications to be represented there; but all this is to be done through the Government, as it is in all the countries in the world. The German States themselves are to be represented through their General Government, their Zollverein, or whatever it is; and so of all the States. This is to be an Exhibition of Governments, each presenting for itself the products of the industry and invention of its citizens. That is the character of it. No individual can go there. It is not like former Exhibitions where everybody could go and throw together as in a great warehouse their inventions and productions, but each Government for itself and by itself presents the productions and the inventions of its own people. That is the character of this Exhibition. In that respect it is novel, unlike anything else that has ever occurred in the world.

Mr. NYE. If this question were presented to-day for the first time, I think I should be opposed to the appropriation now asked for; but it seems to me we have gone so far, this body itself has gone so far, that now it would be impolitic and unwise to take any backward steps. I think this Exhibition is more important to this country than some of the Senators who have spoken in opposition to the appropriation conceive it to be. Vast amounts of money are expended in printing and publishing through newspapers and pamphlets information as to the products of one half of this continent. One half of this continent is a mineral-producing country. We are striving by all means laudable to bring that fact prominently to the knowledge of the world. We are anxious to show, especially to the Governments of the earth that will be convened at this Exhibition, that we have as a whole the richest mineral-producing country in the world. It is important to the nation to establish that fact for reasons which are so perfectly evident that it is hardly necessary to recount them. It is a truth that we look to some of the nations that will be there convened for money upon loan, &c., to sustain our credit. Establish the fact; show them the minerals; show them the rock from which this gold and silver is extracted; let them see it with their own eyes, and it will do more to establish the credit of this Government than twenty agents sent out for the purpose to talk, write, or print.

It is important to this country in another aspect. I believe that we have the highest order of mechanical genius that the world produces. I am not at all afraid of the competitions that will be instituted between the handiwork of our mechanical skill and that of any or all the nations there represented. I think it is due to us in that aspect that this Exhibition should be attended by us as a nation; and if we are to be there represented as a nation, we should be represented with a becoming munificence that pertains to the dignity and character of this nation. If it is necessary to construct a building for that purpose, I think the nation ought to do it, and have as good a one as there is there, and let the world see that, notwithstanding our internal dissensions, we have yet the vigor, the elasticity, the power, the strength, to cope in any branch of industry that will be there represented with any country in the world. I think we have gone so far that we are committed on this subject; and if we are to send our manufactures and our various articles there for exhibition, let them be so exhibited as at least to do justice to the articles that are there exhibited. Let it be done in that spirit of enterprise which characterizes us. Let us not cripple our manufactures or anything that may be there represented for want of ample space commensurate with the power and dignity of this people. I hope, sir, that these appropriations will be made.

The Senator from Iowa says that he doubts the propriety of taxing our people for such a purpose as this. The propriety of many of our acts may be doubted; but in my candid judgment that class of people that bear the most of the burdens of taxation will receive the greatest benefit from this Exhibition. I want to see the fact established there that we have the best farming and agricultural implements in the world. I want the fact established that my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] can manufacture better cotton cloth than they can in Europe; and I want to give him the chance to exhibit it. I want the mechanics of the world to take notice that the machinery made here, the skill of American industry, is better than any other in the world; and in order to do it I want to give the means of exhibiting it on a fair, liberal, ample scale. Sir, we have invited the individual enterprise of the nation to go there by accepting the invitation to attend this Exhibition, and the effect upon that individual enterprise will be disastrous if we stop where we are, and do not go forward and furnish the means for them to exhibit the handiwork of their skill.

I hope my friend from Iowa will not conceive the idea that under the pending amendment we are going to purchase real estate at Paris. It is simply proposed to rear a little structure, temporary in its character, in which to exhibit the handiwork of his countrymen and mine; and when the Exhibition is over the necessity for the structure thus to be reared will cease. Our agents there will see that the lumber is well sold, and that we shall be none the poorer on account of it; but I do think as a nation we shall be infinitely richer when this Exhibition is held.

Mr. STEWART. I understand that the French Government propose to lay a tax on any of our articles exhibited there which may happen to be sold in France after the Exhibition. I think that is rather a mean proceeding.

Mr. NYE. I am not going to discuss with my colleague the follies or the wickedness of the French Government. The time to discuss that question was when we accepted this invitation. My colleague voted for it. Having accepted the invitation to the feast, I trust we shall not refuse to put on the garments appropriate to it. It seems to me that my friend from Iowa is growing more and more economical every day. After accepting an invitation to this world's dinner, he now undertakes to prescribe the bill of fare. I insist upon it that that is not right. If we are to go there, as we have agreed to do, let us go there as becomes us. I do not care what mean things the French Government have done or may do. Probably on comparing notes we should not be far apart on that subject; but we have agreed to go there. Now, the question is whether we shall go as becomes our nation to go, or whether we shall go there having but a simple shanty erected upon the narrow basis on which my friend from Iowa seems anxious to have it done. I think that upon a review of his position he will grow more liberal. I hope, sir, that these appropriations will be passed, and passed in a spirit of earnestness. Let it be known that this nation, having accepted the invitation, robes itself for the feast.

Mr. GRIMES. In reply to the Senator from Nevada, I will state that when we accepted the invitation to this feast we did not expect that we should be compelled to furnish the roof that was to cover us, or the viands that were to garnish the table.

Mr. NYE. If my friend will allow me, it is a sort of national picnic, where each one has to carry his own provisions. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIMES. It seems so. That was not the understanding at the time we accepted this invitation, if we did accept it. But, sir, the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from New York are altogether mistaken as to the terms of our acceptance. Let me send to the Secretary to be read the act of Congress passed two or three months ago, stating in express terms how far we did go. This idea of our furnishing the roof to cover us at this Exposition is an after-thought. We were not told that it would be necessary to do any such thing as that. We were not told that we should have to incur an additional expense of half a million dollars in order to carry out our part of this entertainment. I ask that the joint resolution which I send to the desk be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

A joint resolution in relation to the Industrial Exposition at Paris, France.

Whereas the United States have been invited by the Government of France to take part in a universal exposition of the productions of agriculture, manufactures, and the fine arts, to be held in Paris, in the year 1867:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said invitation is accepted.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the proceedings heretofore adopted by the Secretary of State in relation to the said Exposition, as set forth in his report and accompanying documents concerning that subject, transmitted to both Houses of Congress with the President's message of the 11th instant, are approved.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That the general agent for the said Exposition at New York be authorized to employ such clerks as may be necessary to enable him to fulfill the requirements of the regulations of the imperial commission, not to exceed four in number, one of whom shall receive compensation at the rate of $1,800 per annum, one at $1,600, and two at $1,400.

SEC. 4. And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, authorized and requested to prescribe such general regulations concerning the conduct of the business relating to the part to be taken by the United States in the Exposition as may be proper.

Mr. GRIMES. Now, Mr. President, it will be observed that by the passage of that law Congress did not contemplate the expenditure of any more money; and I would call the attention of the Senate to the suggestion made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] as to the meanness (for that is the proper term) which seems to characterize everything of the action of the French Government, or the controlling powers representing the French Government, in connection with this Exhibition. If one of our artisans carries an article there for exhibition, and he does not desire to bring it back, but chooses to sell it that it may be used, and thus furnish, by the example that it presents to the people around where it is used, an encouragement and an inducement for its more extended use, that American is obliged to pay a heavy duty upon the article. He or the Government of the United States must be at the expense of bringing it back or else he must pay a heavy duty to the French Government in case he sells it there.

Mr. ANTHONY. The ordinary import duty.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, the ordinary import duty. I suppose it is not an extra duty over that which would be levied upon it if he took it there for sale; but that is not any very great inducement to a man to go there, and it does not show that the French Government are inspired by any very high and lofty motives, certainly not by such motives as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] attributes to the French Government, I think.

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. NYE. How was it with our Government when the World's Fair was held here?

Mr. GRIMES. I did not know that we had any World's Fair.

Mr. NYE. Oh, yes, we had.

Mr. GRIMES. I know they had a Fair in New York, but I think the American Government took no part in it. I do not know that it was called a World's Fair. The national Government had nothing to do with it. Citizens of New York got up a large exhibition, built a magnificent crystal palace, and had a very fine show of various articles of production, agricultural and mechanical; but it was not such an exhibition as this is to be. It was not got up by the authorities of the nation, nor was it gotten up by any such motive as has inspired this one.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the more I think about this resolution, the more I feel inclined to oppose it. The original resolution accepting the invitation to attend this Exhibition was passed through the Senate as rather a formal matter. It was not anticipated, and if I recollect aright, it was stated that by accepting the invitation there would be no additional expense to the Government depending upon it; but now we find that the Government of the United States must not only pay for the transportation of our articles to that country, which we expected individuals to do, but the Government must build up additions to Paris, or must build a house to be entertained in after we are invited to the entertainment; and then if any of these articles that are taken over to Paris are disposed of there, as they must be, France proposes to get a revenue out of them. It is a money-making job for France; a matter of paying tribute to France on our part.

My colleague spoke of the wonderful advantages that we would derive from exhibiting our gold and silver in Paris. Sir, it seems to me that we might derive more advantage by an exhibition of them here. They know more about our gold and silver in France to-day than we do ourselves. They have sent commissioners and have made examinations and official reports with regard to Nevada, where we live. We have no such reports in America. It seems to me that an attempt to instruct our own people as to the resources of their own country would be quite as advantageous as this. I do not think any special advantage will be derived in that point of view; for all those countries have had official reports of the mines of the West, while we have had none, and know nothing about them.

But what makes it peculiarly galling to my mind is, that while we are invited to this entertainment, at which we are to pay our own expenses to enrich France, France is insulting us by her puppet monarch on our southern borders. She is defying the Monroe doctrine. I do not believe there is any good faith in all this talk about the withdrawal of the French troops from Mexico. That will depend simply upon the question whether Napoleon will continue to have power to keep them there. If European affairs shall engage him so that it will be impossible for him to continue his troops there he may withdraw them. He will only withdraw them from necessity. He has been very successful for a term of years in blinding, evading, hoodwinking, so to speak, our Government. Although we have a great man at the head of our foreign affairs, I do not think he is a match for Napoleon. He may be a match for anybody else, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. LANE] suggests, but I do not think he is a match for Napoleon. I think Napoleon can very easily negotiate with him so as to keep him quiet and at the same time retain his despotism on our southern borders through all time. Whether he will remove his troops from Mexico or not depends entirely upon his European situation. He may promise to remove them now, on the eve of war in Europe, and if a war should occur requiring all his forces there he may remove them, otherwise he is not bound by this compact. I do not see that there is any binding force compelling him to do it.

Sir, Napoleon, who is threatening and menacing our free institutions, he who took part with the rebellion and mocked us in our adversity, now invites us—a people who stand insulted before the world by him—to come and do homage to him and pay our own expenses. I say the invitation amounts to nothing. Suppose you were invited to a gentleman's house, and you supposed you were going to be treated as guests are usually treated, but you were subsequently advised that you must bring your own dinner, your own wine, and your own cigars, could you not with propriety decline the invitation, particularly if you had to pay a tax on the whisky, cigars, and other viands that you might bring? Suppose you were invited to a dinner, and were then told to bring your own supplies, and that you would have to pay a tax upon them, could you not with propriety decline the invitation? When we accepted the invitation to attend this Exhibition, did we expect to have all these exactions? Did we not suppose that if our artisans took their manufactured articles to be viewed at the French Exhibition they might sell them, after being introduced into the country by invitation, without having an additional duty imposed upon them? Did we anticipate that we would have to erect a building at Paris? I thought that was a great city, with a great many houses in it; but it seems the United States are to build an addition to Paris in order to make an exhibition of our commodities in Europe.

Sir, if we could go there on fair and equal terms, and under equal circumstances, and not have to pocket more insults than any other people ever did, I should be glad to have our country represented there. But in the first place, we are compelled to pocket a whole catalogue of insults, to have our national honor insulted by Maximilian on our southern borders, and to have our Government deceived from time to time by the veriest hypocrite that ever lived and the most bitter foe of republican institutions that has ever disgraced the earth. The man who, when he thought republican institutions were about to be destroyed, had the heart to lend the entire power of the French empire to destroy it; a man who gave this unholy rebellion aid and comfort from the beginning; the man who had the audacity to do that; the man who has strategy enough to deceive our Secretary of State and continue this thing; this man has the impudence to invite us to a feast at which we are to pay our own expenses when we get there; and we are told that it will be impolite to decline the invitation.

Sir, I propose to decline the invitation and take all the chances of being impolite. I do not think it right; I do not think it compatible with our national honor to accept such an invitation. I think that when we visit we should visit upon equal terms. I think we should respect the Monroe doctrine. I think that our national honor and our national standing should be respected and our national theories and our republican institutions acknowledged. We should go to France on equal terms when we meet, and not meet Napoleon as his vassals or inferiors. That is the way I feel on this subject. I do not see that we are under any obligation to build houses in France. I cannot find the warrant in the Constitution that authorizes us to build edifices in France. I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The French Emperor undoubtedly is a very extraordinary man; and if we take the opinion of the American people, he is undoubtedly a very bad man, in a political sense. It may be said of him, however, as a Latin poet once said of Nero:

"Quis Nerone pius?
Quid thermis melius Neroanis?"

"Who is so bad as Nero, but who has so fine baths as he?" I take it, Mr. President, that we are not invited to a family entertainment of Louis Napoleon's; we have not been called upon to pay homage to him in any sense whatever; but as one of the equals in the family of nations, we have been invited to a comparison of the products of the arts of peace with other civilized nations. We are called upon to meet upon common ground in a congress, so to speak, an industrial congress of civilized nations, for this comparison of the developments of the industrial arts of our people with those of other nations.

Now, what have we to do with the hostility of the Emperor of France to this nation under such considerations? Suppose that he is just as hostile to us as he can be imagined to be; that he is desirous, as he has been undoubtedly, to see the Government of this country overturned, as our British cousins or uncles or grandfathers, whatever they may be, have been; what of it? I am in favor of meeting these enemies of ours upon this common ground and of showing them that, notwithstanding the efforts they have made for the last half a dozen years to overthrow us, notwithstanding they have aided to plunge us in distress of the most excessive description, notwithstanding they have deluged us with blood and covered us with death, we have emerged from the conflict stronger, more progressive, more powerful than we entered into it, and that we can compare with them favorably in every arena of peace and industry and progress, while we have demonstrated already that we are ready to meet them in arms on any field where our honor and our duty require. While, therefore, when the proper time comes I would tumble the French into the Gulf of Mexico at the point of the bayonet, I would at the same moment show to every nation in Europe that in all the solid and material prosperity which is the life of a nation we are still steadily advancing, so that with the products of peace in one hand and with the insignia of war in the other I would stand foremost in the world.

Where is the humiliation, I beg to know, in entering into such a contest upon such grounds? We have accepted the invitation. If there be humiliation in it, we have drunk of the cup of humiliation. If there be pride in it, it calls upon us to go forward manfully and boldly, at whatever expense, and meet the consequences.

But it is said that it is not fair for the French to tax our products after sale. Does not that become a matter of trade? It is said it is not fair for the French to ask us to pay the expenses of our own part to the Exhibition. Does not every other nation do the same? Is there any unjust discrimination against us? Not at all. We all meet on equal grounds, every one of us. Then where is the harm?

It is said that the Constitution does not allow the purchase of real estate and the construction of edifices in France. I do not think it does. I do not think there is any warrant in the Constitution for the construction of an edifice by us in France. I do not think there is any warrant in the Constitution for accepting this invitation at all. If it is trespassing on the reserved rights of the States and the people, we ought to have thought of it before. But, seriously speaking, this notion that every time any question relating to our foreign relations arises, if we are to have a commissioner to China, if we are to gather seeds on the other side of the Pacific, if we are to exhibit the fruits of our industry among other nations, we are to take up that time-honored instrument and look into it to see if we can do anything about such a matter, we very much mistake the purport and the scope of that document. The Constitution has nothing to do with the subject. If we are a nation, if we have a national life and a national vitality, we are not to be told that we cannot, among the family of nations and as one of that family, do whatever our external relations of amity, of pride, of industry, of interest require. We have put our hands to the plow; honor and good faith and the pride of our nation require us not to turn back.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I suppose every member of Congress knew when we accepted this invitation that it would necessarily be followed by an appropriation. We had somewhat of the same difficulties which are now presented about foreign parties exhibiting at the Fair which was held in this country some years ago. I think we allowed foreigners to bring in their articles free of duty; but if we ever chance to hold another fair I think we shall not do so. If we did we should bring down our revenue for a year or two, and I am not at all surprised that the Emperor of the French takes care of his revenue, and he has a pretty large one, and has necessity for a large one. I make no objection on that score, because we should do ourselves if it were our case just what it is said he is doing.

After accepting the invitation, is there any sufficient cause why we should refuse to make this provision? The same character of expenditures was incurred by this Government when we accepted the invitation of Great Britain to the Fair at London. I have no doubt that the opportunity given to manufacturers of different nations to exhibit their products and machinery and improvements is calculated to advance the manufacturing interests of the world; and I think there has been no time in our history that we needed such advantages more than we need them now. I feel myself under no embarrassment at all in the acceptance of this invitation; but in my judgment the propriety of this Exhibition, and of giving our citizens the benefit and advantage of it, is so clear that I am in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York, who has this matter in charge, whether the French Government has not already made ample provision for our exhibitors, whether there is any occasion for us to make this additional appropriation. I think I understood him to say that we had thirty thousand square feet assigned to American exhibitors at the Fair. That gives us a space five hundred feet long and sixty feet in width. What information have the committee that more than that is required? If there is no probability of more than that being wanted, there is no occasion to vote this additional appropriation.

Mr. HARRIS. The French Government have appropriated twenty million francs for the expenses of this Exhibition, over four million dollars. They have erected a structure in the center of the Champ de Mars, covering thirty-three acres of ground, a very extensive building, the largest building, perhaps, that was ever erected. They assigned to the United States, after our acceptance of the invitation to partake of this Exhibition, a portion of these thirty-three acres, containing thirty thousand square feet—the eighth in point of size among the various nations that are to partake in the Exhibition. They have offered to us, as they have to other nations, that if we desire more ground than the ground allotted to us in this building, we may erect a structure opposite in the park. That is the offer made to us by the French Government. The exhibitors are so numerous, the number of inventors and producers and manufacturers applying for space in this Exhibition is so great, that our commissioner in Paris suggests that it is absolutely necessary that more ground should be provided. Let me read a clause from his letter:

"The immense number of valuable offerings from applicants for space in groups six, articles of great merit as a rule, renders it absolutely necessary to supplement that group in the park. We shall need more room also for groups one, two, and seven. It seems, therefore, indispensable that the appropriation of $25,000 be made."

That is what our commissioner says. It has been argued here as though the French Government had proposed to us to provide this ground. Not at all. We are under no obligation, in consequence of having accepted the invitation, to erect this structure in the park. We occupy the ground allotted to us; but our exhibitors, our citizens, our inventors, our producers, will not be satisfied with that. They want more ground, and it is for their accommodation that this appropriation is to be made—not because it will please the French Government, but because it will enable us to exhibit the productions and inventions of our citizens to greater advantage. It is for the honor of our country that we appropriate this $25,000, and not because we are under obligations to do it. Perhaps France, perhaps the nations of Europe, would prefer that we should not do it because we shall not exhibit ourselves to so great advantage if we do not do it. At best we shall not be able, probably, to accommodate one half of the productions that are offered, but shall be compelled to select the best and reject the rest. With all the space that we can provide, including this structure, we shall not be able probably to accommodate one half of the productions and inventions that are offered for exhibition.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does this amendment come from the committee?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Edmunds, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Ramsey, Sprague, Van Winkle, Williams, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bucknow, Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Foster, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Stewart, Trumbull, Wade, and Yates—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Poland, Riddle, Sherman, Sumner, Willey, and Wright—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Strike out all of the resolution after the resolving clause and insert these words in lieu of the words stricken out:

That in order to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the universal exhibition of the productions of agriculture, manufactures, and the fine arts, to be held at Paris, in the year 1887, the following sums, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purposes severally specified, are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

First. To provide necessary furniture and fixtures for the proper exhibition of the productions of the United States, according to the plan of the imperial commissioners, in that part of the building exclusively assigned to the use of the United States, $48,000 in coin.

*Secondly. To provide additional accommodations in the park, $25,000 in coin.

Thirdly. For the compensation of the principal agent of the Exhibition in the United States, at the rate of $2,000 a year: Provided, That the period of such service shall not extend beyond sixty days after the close of the Exhibition, $4,000, or so much thereof as may be found necessary.

Fourthly. For office rent at New York, for fixtures, stationery, and advertising; for rent of storehouse for reception of articles and products; for expenses of shipping, including cartages, &c.; for freights on the articles to be exhibited from New York to France and return, and for compensation of four clerks, in conformity with the joint resolution approved on the 15th of January, 1886, and for contingent expenses, the sum of $33,700, or so much thereof as may be found necessary.

Fifthly. For expenses in receiving, bonding, storage, cartage, labor, &c., at Havre; for railway transportation from Havre to Paris, going and returning; for labor in the palace; for sweeping and sprinkling compartments for seven months; for guards and keepers for seven months; for linguists (eight men) for seven months; for storing, packing-boxes, carting, and for material for repacking; for clerk hire, stationery, rent, and contingent expenses, the sum of $35,703, or so much thereof as may be found necessary, in coin.

Sixthly. For the traveling expenses of ten professional and scientific commissioners, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, at the rate of $1,000 each, $10,000; it being understood that the President may appoint additional commissioners, not exceeding twenty in number, whose expenses shall not be paid. But no person interested directly or indirectly in any article exhibited shall be a commissioner; nor shall any member of Congress or any person holding an appointment or office of honor or trust under the United States be appointed a commissioner, agent, or officer under this resolution.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Governors of the several States be, and they are hereby, requested to invite the patriotic people of their respective States to assist in the proper representation of the handiwork of our artisans and the prolific sources of material wealth with which our land is blessed, and to take such further measures as may be necessary to diffuse a knowledge of the proposed Exhibition and to secure to their respective States the advantages which it promises.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer this further amendment, to come in as an additional section:

And be it further resolved, That it shall be the duty of the said general agent at New York and the said commissioner general at Paris to transmit to Congress, through the Department of State, a detailed statement of the manner in which such expenditures as are hereinbefore provided for are made by them respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. The resolution was read the third time.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Crugin, Creswell, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Van Winkle, Williams, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Saulsbury, Stewart, Trumbull, and Wade—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Poland, Riddle, Sherman, Sumner, Willey, Wright, and Yates—15.

So the joint resolution was passed. On the motion of Mr. HARRIS its title was amended so as to read, "A joint resolution to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the Universal Exhibition at Paris in 1867."

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we are getting to a stage of the session when we ought to work on Saturdays.

Several SENATORS. There is no business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is so much to do that it is difficult now to get the floor to call up any measure, there is such a struggle here. I have had bills in my possession to report for three or four days, but I could not get the floor to report them. It seems to me we had better meet on Saturdays, and shorten the session. I submit to the Senate whether we are to adjourn over at this season of the year and this stage of the session.

Mr. POMEROY. The bill reported by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] is a very important measure. It was considered in the morning hour to-day, and he hopes to be able to pass it to-morrow. I trust, therefore, we shall not adjourn over.

Several SENATORS. Pass it to-day.

Mr. GRIMES. That Pacific railroad bill is a very important bill, and there are gentlemen who feel an interest in it that have not yet seen it and who did not know that there was any such bill here until this morning. For myself, I should like an opportunity to examine it and see what its bearing is.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was reported last week.

Mr. GRIMES. It may have been reported, but the attention of the Senate was not called to it by any written or printed report, and I never heard of it until to-day. I should like to have it go over until next week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

REIMBURSEMENT OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to give notice of my intention to ask the Senate's consideration to a joint resolution to reimburse Massachusetts for expenditures for the common defense on Monday next.

LEVY COURT OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. MORRILL. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 325.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 325) to give certain powers to the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

In addition to the existing remedy by distress for the recovery of taxes due to the levy court in the county of Washington, real property in the county, outside the corporate limits of Georgetown and Washington, on which one year's taxes shall be due and unpaid, or so much thereof, not less than one acre, (where the property on which the tax has accrued is not less than that quantity,) as may be necessary to pay such taxes, with all legal costs and charges arising thereon, may be sold at public sale, to satisfy the taxes and expenses, by the collector appointed by the levy court. Public notice is to be given of the time and place of sale by advertising once a week for eight successive weeks in some newspaper published in the city of Washington, in which advertisement shall be given a sufficient and definite description of the property selected for sale, the name of the person to whom it is assessed, and the aggregate amount of taxes due thereon. The purchaser is to pay, at the time of sale, the amount of taxes due on the property so purchased, with the amount of expenses of sale, and to pay the residue of the purchase money within ten days after the expiration of two years from the day of sale, to the collector or other officer of the levy court authorized to receive the same, and the amount of the residue is to be placed in the treasury of the levy court, subject to the order of the original proprietor or proprietors of the property sold, his, her, or their legal representatives, and the purchaser is to receive a title thereto in fee-simple, by deed, under the hand of the president of the levy court and its seal, which shall be deemed good and valid in law and equity; but if within two years from the day of sale, or before the purchaser or purchasers shall have paid the residue, if any, of the purchase money, the proprietor or proprietors of any property thus sold, his, her, or their agents or legal representatives shall repay to the purchaser the money paid for taxes and expenses, together with ten per cent. per annum as interest thereon, or make a tender thereof, or deposit the same with the treasurer of the levy court or other officer authorized to receive it for the use of the purchaser and subject to his order, he, she, or they shall be reinstated in his, her, or their original right and title, as if no such sale had been made. If any purchaser shall fail to pay the residue of the purchase money within the time required for any property so purchased by him, he shall pay ten per cent. per annum, as interest thereon, in addition to the residue, from the expiration of the two years until the actual payment of the residue and the receiving of a conveyance, and this interest shall alike be subject to the order of the original proprietor or proprietors as the residue of the purchase money; but no sale is to be made of any improved property whereon there is personal property of sufficient value to pay the taxes, nor of such improved property whereon there is not such personal property until the collector shall first file a sworn return with the clerk of the levy court that there is no such personal property, which return shall be prima facie proof of that fact. Minors, mortgagees, and others having equitable liens or other interests, as creditors, in real property sold for taxes shall be allowed one year after such minors' coming to full age, or after such mortgagees, or others having equitable interests, obtaining possession of, or a decree for the sale of, such property, to redeem the same from the purchaser, his heirs, or assigns, on paying the amount of the purchase money, with ten per cent. interest thereon per annum, and the value of any improvements erected on the property by the purchaser or his assigns while in his possession.

The collector may postpone, after advertisement, the sale of the property advertised to any future day, for want of bidders, or other reasonable cause, giving public notice of the postponement; and the sale made at such postponed time shall be equally valid as if made on the day stated in the advertisement. The collector of the levy court is to have authority to collect any tax lawfully imposed by the court, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the person chargeable therewith, wherever the same may be found in the county of Washington, out of the corporate limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown; but no such sale shall be made unless ten days' previous notice thereof be given in some newspaper printed in the city of Washington.

The Committee on the District of Columbia proposed to amend the bill by adding the following additional section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be necessary that the said levy court shall have actually paid the portion of the general expenses of the county of Washington, or any other expenses, a portion of which either of the cities of Washington or Georgetown is liable for, to enable the said court to demand of either of said cities payment of its proportion of said expenses already incurred, or for the supreme court of the District of Columbia to act summarily in the matter and give judgment according to the provisions of the act of July 1, 1812, entitled "An act conferring certain powers on the levy court for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 137.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 137) to amend the acts approved August 6, 1861, and July 16, 1862, establishing a Metropolitan police in the District of Columbia, to increase the efficiency thereof, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read.

Mr. MORRILL. Perhaps I had better call the attention of the Senate to the bill and state what it is in a few words before the amendments are read. It is a bill, as it purports to be, to amend the acts creating the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia. The first section simply changes the title of the officers, and I suppose is unimportant except that it further authorizes the board of commissioners of police to appoint an additional officer whose rank is that of captain, and also authorizes them to appoint a clerk, twenty sergeants, and fifty patrolmen or privates. The second section of the bill is stricken out. The third section of the bill, which the committee recommend, provides for the accumulation of a small fund by the board of police as a contingent fund out of the forfeitures and penalties which are provided by a general law. The fourth section of the bill provides that hereafter no licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be granted except upon the approval of the board. The other sections are simply provisions for the enforcement of the act to which this is supplemental. I believe I have stated the particulars in which this bill is a change of the metropolitan system as it now exists.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The amendments of the committee will be reported in their order.

The first amendment was read. It was to strike out the second section of the bill in the following words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That on and after the passage of this act the annual compensation of the major commanding the force shall be $1,600; the captain and inspector, the secretary, and the property clerk, be $1,200; the clerks, $1,000; the commissioners and the surgeons, $400; the lieutenants, $700; the sergeants, $650; the patrolmen or privates, $600; and the treasurer and detectives $800 each, respectively. The lieutenants, sergeants, patrolmen, and detectives, authorized to be employed by this act, and by the acts of August 6, 1861, and July 16, 1862, as hereby amended, shall be paid through the treasurer of the board of police, the additional compensation which the corporate authorities of the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington are authorized and required by the act approved March 2, 1865, to pay in the proportion to the number of lieutenants, sergeants, privates, and detectives allotted by the board of police to actual duty within the respective municipal jurisdictions of the District, and all the other officers and employees of the Metropolitan police establishment authorized by this and the aforesaid acts shall be paid an additional compensation of fifty per cent., twelve fifteenths by the authorities of Washington, two fifteenths by the authorities of Georgetown, and one fifteenth by the authorities of the county of Washington; and the said authorities shall have power, and they are hereby required, in addition to other taxes authorized to be levied, to annually levy and collect a special tax sufficient to pay the additional compensation, said tax not to exceed one fourth of one per cent. on all property within each of the said corporate jurisdictions of the District; and upon the monthly requisition of the treasurer, countersigned by the secretary of the board of police for their respective proportionate shares of the gross sum payable each month as herein prescribed, it shall be the duty of the proper officers of said cities and county to pay to the same to, and take of duplicate receipts from, said treasurer therefor, the original of which shall be filed in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury of the United States within ten days thereafter by the officer receiving the same. And if the said corporate authorities of said cities or county, or either of them, fail or refuse to meet the requirements of this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be levied and collected the tax hereinbefore provided, and the expense of collection thereof shall be borne in just proportions by the respective jurisdictions in which such collection may be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the third section to strike out all after the word "seal" in the eleventh line, as follows:

And it shall be unlawful to so give, sell, or otherwise dispose of any intoxicating liquor on Sunday or on any election or holiday, or other special occasion whenever the board of police shall deem the public peace requires such suspension of sale, and shall so direct by general rule or other proper notice; and such sale or disposition is hereby prohibited on every other day after twelve o'clock p. m. until five o'clock a. m. the following day; and for the first violation of any provision of this section the person or persons offending shall forfeit and pay the sum of twenty dollars, for the second offense forty dollars, and for the third offense the license of such party shall be forfeited.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the fifth section, as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That until otherwise directed by Congress, all fines collected for keeping open restaurants, or other places where intoxicating liquors may be sold on the Sabbath, election or holiday, or other day prohibited by the board of police, or for other violations of the Sabbath day, as also all fines collected for keeping open bars and selling intoxicating liquors after twelve o'clock at night and before five o'clock in the morning, may be reserved by the treasurer of the police board until said fines amount to the sum of $2,000 in one year, to be appropriated by the board to meet necessary contingent expenses; and the excess of such fines over $2,000 that may be collected in any one fiscal year of the Government shall be paid by the treasurer of the police board to the treasurer of the jurisdiction in which the offense was committed; and except those awarded by special act to the use of the authorities of Washington and Georgetown and the levy court for school purposes, all other fines so collected shall be held by said treasurer to be expended under the direction of the board of police, to build and provide station-houses in those precincts in which station-houses have not already been provided, until a sum has accumulated sufficient to so provide them, after which, except an amount equal to the expense of necessary fuel, light, furniture, cleanliness, and repairs, (which may hereafter be deducted in each and all of the precincts of the District,) the same shall be paid over to the proper officers of said cities and county without further abatement; and until enough has accumulated to build said station-houses and furnish, warm, light, and cleanse them, it shall be the duty of the authorities of the several jurisdictions, and they are required, to keep the station-houses clean and in all respects in a comfortable sanitary condition, each municipal authority in its respective jurisdiction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the seventh section of the bill in the following words:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That after the passage of this act, if any person shall be charged on oath or affirmation, before the magistrate officiating at the central executive office of the Metropolitan police for the District of Columbia, with being a professional thief, burglar, or pickpocket, and shall have been arrested by the police authorities at any place within said District, and if it shall be proven to the satisfaction of the said magistrate, by sufficient testimony, that such thief, burglar, or pickpocket had an unlawful purpose in view at the time of such arrest, he or she shall be committed by said magistrate to the county jail for a term not exceeding ninety days; or, in the discretion of the magistrate, he or she shall be required to enter security not to violate any civil or criminal law of the District for a period not exceeding one year. And if any person arrested as a professional thief, pickpocket, or burglar shall feel himself or herself aggrieved by any such act, judgment, or determination of the said magistrate officiating at the central office of the Metropolitan police, in and concerning the execution of this act, he or she may apply to either judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia for a writ of habeas corpus, and upon return thereof there shall be a rehearing of the evidence before such judge, and he may either discharge, modify, or confirm the commitment or the amount and duration of the security.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out in section eight, line four, the words "and justices of the peace;" so that the clause will read:

That from and after the passage of this act the property clerk of the Metropolitan police district shall be vested with all the powers now conferred by law upon notaries public in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that I fully understand the tenth section of this bill. It provides—

That hereafter no person shall assume or practice the occupation of detective within the limits of the District of Columbia who shall not first receive a specific appointment for that purpose.

That prohibits anybody from acting as a detective here unless he has been specifically appointed for that purpose; but it goes on:

Or if pursuing the detection of criminals as a private business outside of such authority, and not otherwise specifically authorized by law, any person so practicing shall enter into bonds.

It seems to me these two provisions are inconsistent with each other. That word "or" should be "unless." The first four lines positively prohibit anybody else from pursuing the business, and the latter part of the section would seem to tolerate a private detective on his giving bonds.

Mr. MORRILL. The idea was that nobody here should pursue this business unless he was authorized by the authorities here; but suppose a detective was sent here from abroad, they would not refuse him the right to act, he being properly accredited; but as his functions were to be performed here, they would require him to give bonds that he would faithfully perform them so far as their jurisdiction is concerned. That was the idea.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is the mere phraseology to which I am calling the Senator's attention. First, there is a positive prohibition against any one acting. Then what? After making that positive prohibition the section goes on at considerable length in its subsequent language to authorize other persons to act. It seems to me this should be put in by way of exception. The Senator from Maine sees that my objection is merely to phraseology; the word "or" it seems to me is an improper word there.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the Senator is right in that, and I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Further, I suggest to the Senator from Maine whether it is best to throw that obstacle around a detective who comes here from abroad. Professional criminals, pickpockets, and thieves go from city to city and are on the cars. They are frequently followed by detectives who enter the cars with them, follow them all the way, perhaps from Boston or Chicago, to Baltimore or Washington. By the provisions of this bill a detective who perhaps had come on the cars a thousand miles watching suspected persons could not act as a detective in the city of Washington when he got here without entering into this bond. I question very much whether that obstacle should be thrown in the way of his acting. I do not know what the mischief is; I do not know the necessity for requiring this bond. If there is any abuse by detectives coming here there may be a necessity for it.

I suggest to the Senator from Maine whether he is not placing too much of an obstacle in the way of detectives from abroad, or private detectives here. They have in some of the cities, I know, private detectives who are very efficient. I suppose by the prohibition of them here it is supposed that they interfere in some way with the regular detectives, or are objectionable. I was not aware that they were found so. I think in some of the cities there has been organized a private detective force that has been much more efficient than the public force in ferreting out crime.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state the origin of this section. It is copied from the Metropolitan police system of New York. I am not sure that the criticisms of the Senator are not entirely just. In fact I have no particular opinions upon the subject. I know that the police board of this city are anxious to have this provision made, and our ground is this: this is a Metropolitan police under the direction of Congress entirely; it is intended to be complete in itself and to operate efficiently in the District of Columbia. This provision goes upon the assumption that through the efficiency of this board of police commissioners the whole system can be rendered more efficient operating through it than independent of it. It is said that is the experience in the large cities, particularly in the city of New York, where the system has been brought perhaps to its highest state of perfection; and the design is that detectives outside coming here should be required to cooperate with the Metropolitan police of this District. That I understand to be the purpose and object of this section of the bill; and it is in conformity to a provision ingrafted upon the Metropolitan police system of the city of New York. I have no great desire about it. If the Senator moves that the section be stricken out, and is very decided in his convictions that it ought not to be in, I have no objection, although for myself I do not see that any practical difficulty will arise from it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not propose to move to strike it out; but it struck me that the section might create embarrassment. I presume, however, it has received the careful consideration of the committee; and if they think it is best to retain it, I shall not object. I think there ought to be a verbal amendment to carry out what the Senator intends. I suggest that the words "or if" in the fourth line had better be stricken out and the word "unless" be substituted.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that. The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

HOWARD INSTITUTE AND HOME.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up House bill No. 482, to incorporate the Howard Institute, &c.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 482) to incorporate the Howard Institute and Home of the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

James M. Edmunds, Sayles J. Bowen, Cordial Storrs, Augustin Chester, John R. Elvans, J. Sayles Brown, and Linus D. Bishop, and their associates and successors, are by this bill declared to be a body politic and corporate, under the name and style of "The Howard Institute and Home" of the District of Columbia.

The object for which this corporation is created is the establishment of a charitable institution for the instruction of freedmen in the industrial pursuits of life, and to fit them for independent self-support, and to afford a temporary home for such freedmen as may, from sickness, misfortune, age, or infirmity require fostering care until otherwise relieved. The persons specifically named are appointed a board of managers of the Howard Institute and Home for one year from and after the passage of the act; and thereafter a board of managers, consisting of seven persons, is to be elected from and by the contributors to the means to establish the institution, for such time and according to such rules as the corporation may establish.

The corporation is to be maintained by voluntary contributions, gifts, donations, or bequests of money and other property. The board of managers are to cause a record to be kept of all such contributions, gifts, donations, and bequests, with the name and residence of each person making the same, and of all expenditures made by the board for the establishment and conduct of the institute and home, and to make an annual report exhibiting the several items of expenditures and objects thereof, and generally the work accomplished by the corporation, to the Secretary of the Interior, a copy of which report shall be sent to each individual who shall have contributed not less than five dollars to the corporation during the year previous to the issuing of the report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIFE AND ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. YATES. I move to take up Senate bill No. 290. The bill has already been read, and there was some objection, I believe, of a technical character, which has been withdrawn.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 290) to incorporate the National Life and Accident Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

METROPOLITAN MINING COMPANY.

Mr. CRESWELL. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 178, to incorporate the Metropolitan Mining and Manufacturing Company.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CRESWELL. I desire to propose some verbal amendments. In the eighth line of the first section I move to strike out the word "company" and insert "corporation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. In the seventeenth line of the first section I move to fill the blank with the word "five;" so that the clause will read:

And any person of lawful age, and a citizen of the United States, shall be permitted to subscribe upon paying five dollars on each share at the time of subscribing.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. I move to insert after the word "election" in the sixteenth line of section two the words "and until their successors shall be duly elected and qualified;" so that the clause will read:

The stockholders shall then and there elect nine directors to serve until the next ensuing election and until their successors shall be duly elected and qualified as provided for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. I now move to strike out from the nineteenth and twentieth lines of section two the following words, "next ensuing election, as herein provided for," and to insert "election and qualification of his successor;" so that the clause will read:

And at the first ensuing meeting of the directors after every election they shall appoint one of their number as president, who, together with themselves, shall hold office until the election and qualification of his successor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. I also move to strike out the words "together with themselves" after the word "who" in line eighteen.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. I next move to strike out the word "place" in the third line of the fourth section and insert "places;" so as to make it plural instead of singular.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

Mr. CRESWELL. From line twelve of section four I move to strike out the word "same" and insert "said shares."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That verbal correction will also be made.

Mr. CRESWELL. From the fourteenth line of that section I move to strike out the words "the same" and to insert "any installment that may be due and unpaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. From the fifteenth and sixteenth lines of that section I move to strike out the words "the installment or proportion so unpaid" and to insert in lieu thereof "the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. After the words "United States" in the sixth line of the fifth section I move to insert the words "or of any State."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. From the fourth line of section six I move to strike out the word "certain."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it were possible to get the attention of Senators for a few moments—the Senate is very thin—I should really like to call their earnest attention to the character of these bills. We are inaugurating a new system, and we are doing it, I think, without sufficient consideration. If the Congress of the United States has made up its mind—and I think we ought to have a full vote upon that question—to charter companies to operate all over the United States, in mining and for other purposes, our statutes will be swelled into volumes at every session. Here it is proposed to incorporate the Metropolitan Mining and Manufacturing Company, not in the District of Columbia, but to operate in my State, if you please, as a coal company. What are they authorized to do? The president and directors "are authorized and empowered, in behalf of said company, to purchase and hold by deed, for a term certain, or in fee-simple, lands and other real estate, to carry on the business of mining for iron ore and other native materials, and manufacturing and preparing the same for market, and to issue bonds," &c. This company that is chartered here may go into the State of Maine or into the State of Illinois and buy as much land as they please and carry on the business of mining and manufacturing there. They may go into Wisconsin.

This is a new system. Whenever a company has been authorized to operate in the State of Illinois, and I presume in Wisconsin or Ohio, they have got their charters from those States. The Legislatures of the different States understand the necessity for granting these charters; and I know it has been the case in the State of Illinois, and I presume it has been in other States—probably in Kentucky and in Delaware and in Virginia and elsewhere—whenever a company has been chartered certain restrictions have been put upon them as to the amount of real estate they shall hold. It has been considered to be contrary to the public policy of our institutions to allow corporations to acquire large tracts of real estate and hold them in perpetuity. We, in chartering banks in the State of Illinois—I speak of that State because I am more familiar with its legislation; but I presume it is not unlike the legislation of Kentucky, Missouri, and other States around us—do not authorize them to purchase and hold real estate except such as may be necessary for their convenience in transacting their business; and whenever they acquire the title to real estate on judgments, being compelled to bid it in for the collection of debts, we require them to dispose of it within a certain time.

Now, I wish to ask Senators if they are prepared to charter companies to operate in Nevada, if you please, or in California, with no personal responsibility in the stockholders. That is the case with most of these corporations. In the bill which we passed a few moments ago, incorporating an insurance company, it is expressly provided that the stockholders shall not be liable personally in any form for any of the debts. If this system of legislation is pursued it will draw to the Federal Government the chartering of all the companies that are operating all over the United States; and we are passing these bills here without any very practical examination. I am quite sure they would receive a more thorough examination in the Illinois Legislature before that body would consent to pass them.

Is there any necessity for this in the District of Columbia? If there is, I have no sort of objection to the bill. If it is a company created for the purpose of mining for iron ore and other materials within the District, and there is a necessity for it, I have no objection to it; but does not anybody suppose that is the design of this? Then we are legislating for whom? For a private company outside of this District. Is that legitimate?

I suggest these things by way of inquiry and to call attention to this matter. It is a new species of legislation upon which we are embarking, and the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I think, should inform the Senate and we should know whether he proposes to grant charters to carry on mining and manufacturing business all over the United States in any of the States anywhere, here by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. With the permission of the Senator from Illinois, I will state to the Senate the position of this question before the committee. I agree with the Senator from Illinois that the question is novel, that this particular legislation is new to the Senate; and the committee had some doubts about it. But the Senate will remember that on a former occasion, when a bill of a similar type, entitled "A bill to incorporate the National Mutual Protection Homestead Company," was before the Senate, I took occasion to state distinctly what the views of the committee were upon the subject. I then stated fully, as the Senator from Illinois will remember, that I felt bound to say that the committee was in some doubt about the propriety of the measure which was presented; but that as a great many bills had been referred by the Senate to the committee for its consideration, we concluded to report the measures back to the Senate for the action of the body; and on that occasion, as the organ of the committee, I stated particularly the new feature of that bill, that it was a bill to charter a company here, some of the parties living here and some in the States, when the theater of action was to be in the States. It was creating an artificial person, so to speak, within the District of Columbia, with the right to exercise certain powers with the permission of the States where they contemplated to set up operations. That was a bill not unlike this in some of its features. It was a bill where the parties proposed to go into the southern States, and purchase and occupy and sell and lease and improve large quantities of the unoccupied lands. We had also before us a bill of a similar type, which proposed to associate wealth in this way to engage in the raising of cotton and the other products of the southern States. So far as we invest them with any authority here, it is simply the authority with which they would be invested by any State Legislature.

There is no authority in any of these bills to do any act in these States not in harmony with the policy of the States. But that, I know, does not reach the objection which the Senator from Illinois raises, that it is not desirable that we should enter upon this class of legislation; that it does not legitimately and properly belong to the Government; that we shall be burdened with it if we inaugurate it. I desire as much as he does, and I know the committee concur with me in desiring an expression of the Senate, whether they propose to give countenance to this class of bills. If they do, we are in the way of our duty in reporting them. We did report them, and we did say when they were reported that it was entering upon a new species of legislation; but the committee are of opinion, so far as authority is concerned, that there does not seem to be any authority against it, because we do not invest these parties with any power to act outside of the District of Columbia, except in submission to the authority, State or Federal, wherever they go.

Mr. WADE. I agree with what the Senator from Maine has said on this subject. The Committee on the District of Columbia have had a great many applications to establish this kind of incorporations. I really do not know anything new in principle that arises here. We have power, I suppose, to legislate in this District to the same extent that a State Legislature has in a State. We can do anything not contrary to the Constitution of the United States or repugnant to the principles of our Government, in this District, to exactly the extent that a State may do. The mere location of a corporation is not of very much consequence. I suppose it makes very little difference where an incorporation is established. They can, in the absence of all authority of the State to the contrary, operate in any State to the same extent that an individual can, but always subject to the authority, limitation, and control of the State in which they set up their business. Indeed, it is common for our great corporations that have an extended business, which requires a great deal of capital and a great many persons to associate together properly to carry it on, to operate in many of the States. That principle is familiar to everybody. There is the celebrated life insurance company at Hartford, Connecticut, perhaps one of the largest and wealthiest corporations in the United States, and I suppose it is in the full tide of operation in every State of the Union, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It is so with your banking corporations, your express companies, and a great many others. They can do business anywhere. Whenever there is a legislative body that has power to incorporate a company, to give it perpetual succession, so that it can go on and do its business, when it gets its charter, it is perfectly immaterial where it may be located. It must conform, of course, to the legislation of the States where it goes to do its business. Take a life insurance company: if it undertakes to set up business in the State of New York it must have at least $200,000 of capital paid in, and that State imposes some other limitations; but these being complied with, the State permits them to go on and establish their branches there without any regard to where the main corporation is located. So with other incorporations.

I cannot see, therefore, that there is anything new in the principle of incorporating these institutions in the District of Columbia. We have as much power and authority to do it as a State Legislature has to do it in a State. Whether it shall be in the District of Columbia or in a State of this Union seems to me to be very unimportant. Whatever the terms and the restrictions are is always of importance.

If, as the Senator from Illinois says, we incorporated a company without any personal liability, we did wrong, and we should have done equally wrong in that if we had been legislating for a State. We should not give such a latitude as that; but we should place them under wholesome and wise restrictions, and then they are as safe in this District as anywhere else; and it brings us back barely to this question: shall we allow ourselves to give these acts of incorporation, or shall we turn the parties off to the States? I admit that the business may be a little troublesome to us, but it is frequently a great convenience to do it here. Our whole legislation should be for the benefit of the people of the United States, and we can do this as amply, as justly, and with as little objection as any State can. When the people apply to me as a legislator, and I can find no reason why I may not do what they want as well as any other authority, I do not feel like turning them off somewhere else.

This is all I have to say on the question. If there is any objection to the bill it must be to the incorporation itself. That is simply associating wealth in a few hands in enabling them to do business, and it is just as objectionable in a State as it is in this District. A great commercial people, full of enterprise and of all kinds of business, like the people of the United States, have found that it is necessary to form corporations, and they will continue to do it, either in this District or in the States, and I have no objection to their doing it here. Therefore it is that we have passed a great many of these acts of incorporation, and I see no reason why we should cease to do it. If there are objections to the sweeping allowance given to this company I am for restricting it.

Mr. CONNESS. I will not undertake to discuss the question of power involved in this case, but leave that to gentlemen learned in the law who are here; but the tendency of this legislation seems to me to be as bad as anything can be. What is it? A number of gentlemen, citizens of different States, want to engage in business in a corporate capacity; and in place of making an application to one of the States in which they belong, they come here to Congress to make their application where they are comparatively unknown. If they made their application at home where they were known, the local Legislature would be a judge of their fitness and capacity to receive the great grant of powers that are always given to a corporate body.

It is said that it enables an association, an aggregation of wealth. The local Legislature would be competent to determine whether it was to be an aggregation of wealth or an aggregation of persons representing no wealth at all, who in a careless manner, to be provided in a congressional act, might go forward and go forth as being capitalists when they really had no capital, but the appearance of it merely that was given by a congressional act of incorporation. Because Congress has the right and power to legislate exclusively for the District of Columbia, many persons come here to call upon us to exercise that power by extending to them, not citizens of the District of Columbia, not residents of it at all, corporate powers. That seems to me to be a very dangerous practice to encourage.

In every aspect of the case that I can view it, it is a class of legislation that I think should not be done. Inaugurate it once, and your tables will groan under bills induced by applications from all portions of the Union. To organize this company and allow them to carry on a corporate business in the State of California, for instance mining, under restrictions not such as that State imposes upon those who transact such business within its limits, seems to me to be very wrong indeed. We are very careful in that State what class of acts we pass. Indeed no special act of incorporation is allowed to be passed under the constitution of that State; but there is a general incorporation law under which a given number of the citizens of the State may organize for the purposes allowed by that law, and they are held and required to pay in a given amount of capital before they begin. They are required by the constitution of that State to have a certain degree of responsibility for their transactions as corporators and as individuals; and the law passed in obedience to the State constitution, the general act, requires conformance to its provisions. We do not want, certainly in that State, that Congress shall organize companies that shall be empowered to operate within our State and who are not subject to our control.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator will allow me to suggest that on that point this bill is subjected to the local authorities wherever it goes.

They can do nothing against your authority and without your consent.

Mr. CONNESS. We do not know anything about them. They are strangers to us. We are to institute a system, in the first place, of investigation; we are to command them to appear before us, and to ask them who they are, what they are, what capital they have, and what they are going to do. I submit that we had better not do it at all, and that really our proper sphere and bound in the premises is to legislate for this District, and not for outside of this District, in these matters. I cannot conceive of legislation more, not simply unhealthy, but calculated to result in effects so vicious as this.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am very glad the Senator from California has felt it to be his duty to resist the passage of this bill. I was appealed to by an esteemed friend to support the bill, and should be very glad to do so if I could; but it seems to me that it is a species of legislation that we ought to defeat at once; and I had not expected the very able chairman of the District Committee to advocate the passage of this bill. He had contributed by his able argument to some extent to the formation of my judgment upon measures of this sort. His argument against the power of Congress to authorize the construction of railroad and telegraph lines through the States seemed to me to be entirely conclusive. The only difference between the measure which he then opposed and the one which he now advocates is, that this is within the letter but outside of the spirit and purpose of the Constitution. The Constitution authorizes us to legislate for this District, for the business and people of the District. Now, I do not question that Congress may establish a corporation, may pass a law creating a corporation for business purposes within this District; but when we know that the corporation is not to exercise its powers within the District, and that it is intended to exercise those powers somewhere else, we are legislating for a purpose not within the District, and keeping ourselves within the letter of the Constitution, we go outside of the purpose and spirit of that document.

Can we establish a corporation in the State of California? Unquestionably not. But it is proposed here that we shall incorporate a gold mining company, when we know there is no gold in the District of Columbia. By the way, I did hear that there was gold discovered recently in the District. How that may turn out I do not know; but we know pretty well that there is no gold in the District.

Mr. SPRAGUE. There is some in the Treasury.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is mined for pretty successfully. It does not need any incorporated company to mine for the gold in the Treasury. When we know that there are no gold mines in the District of Columbia, shall we incorporate a mining company not to operate in the District? But that company we anticipate is to secure the consent of California and exercise its powers in the State of California. I think this is entirely outside of the spirit of the Constitution. If any gentlemen of the District of Columbia want to carry on important business in any of the States of this Union, why do they not go to the States and get the authority? If Senators desire that some very important pursuit shall be carried on in the State of Indiana, is that a sufficient reason for the incorporation of a company by Congress to go into the State of Indiana and exercise its powers? Let the gentlemen who wish to establish such an institution go to the State, and if it is the pleasure of the Legislature to grant them the power, all right.

We all know that this company is not for this District. That is known in advance. It is not required for any purpose in the District of Columbia, but for operations outside of the District. Now, I ask the Senator from Maine who advocates this bill, what is the difference if we intend, and that is the only purpose of the bill, this company to go into the State of Maryland or Virginia and mine for coal—what is the difference between our action in spirit and in fact and our establishing a railroad corporation to run a railroad from Pittsburgh to Cleveland? I think no Senator will say that we have the power to authorize the construction of a railroad in the State of Ohio to go over the people's lands, to condemn their lands, and all that; but what is the difference in spirit? Suppose we organize a railroad company in the District of Columbia, and we know the railroad is not to be built in the District, but is to be built somewhere else, in the State of Maryland, for instance, are we justified simply because we say that the company must secure the consent of Maryland before it shall exercise its power in the State of Maryland?

Mr. WADE. Whether it is a mining company or a railroad company, if it wished to operate in Maryland or Ohio, it must, of course, get the consent of Maryland or Ohio in the one case as much as the other.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know that is the apology for this bill. You do not want to build a railroad in the District, but you want to build one in the State of Maryland. If that is the purpose, why not go to the State of Maryland and get a charter?

Mr. MORRILL. As the Senator from Indiana has alluded to me, he will permit me to suggest the obvious distinction between this bill and the case he puts of the legislation to which he refers. This bill provides an act of incorporation in the District of Columbia. It does not give the corporation the right to exercise any authority outside of this District; it does not invest them with one particle of power outside; but they are authorized here to create a manufacturing establishment of iron. Then they would have a right to send their agent into Pennsylvania and purchase lands for mining both coal and iron; but of course they would have to do it in submission to the laws of Pennsylvania, both State and municipal; because the Senator will see that there is not a particle of power conferred on them to go to Pennsylvania clothed with any authority whatever; and therefore I suggest to him most respectfully that there is no question of power involved. As to the constitutionality of the measure, we are clearly within the scope, because we only invest them with power in this District. Being an artificial person, they may go abroad just as a natural person would; but they must trust their luck. If they find the local authority against them they must retire.

I submit to the honorable Senator that that is the distinction between this case and the one to which I spoke the other day. The real question in my mind, and on that I hesitate—and I beg the Senate to observe that I am not committed to the advocacy of this bill—is the question raised by the Senator from Illinois. That is the true question, whether we ought not, in granting corporations, to limit and restrain them to the District of Columbia; or if we do not do that, whether we should not decline to associate gentlemen and give them corporate powers if we know their purpose is to operate outside of the District, and not in it. On that question, as a matter of policy, I think there is very great doubt.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think it is a question of policy; nor do I think it is a question whether this bill is within the letter of the Constitution; but I think it is a question whether this bill is within the spirit of the Constitution. The Constitution simply authorizes Congress to legislate for the District of Columbia. We know that this legislation is not for the District of Columbia. We know that it is to create an artificial body to travel outside of the District of Columbia, and obtain the assent of the State to exercise the powers that we confer somewhere else than in the District of Columbia.

But, sir, just what this corporation can do it is a little difficult to say, from the reading of the bill. I do not know where all the corporations live. It proposes that John Ford, George D. Williams, and others—perhaps they are citizens of the District; I do not know—be "authorized and empowered to receive subscriptions to the capital stock of a company to be denominated the Metropolitan Mining and Manufacturing Company," and then the bill directs how they shall be organized, and how the affairs of the company shall be conducted. Then the bill provides, in the sixth section—

That the president and directors are hereby empowered and fully authorized, on behalf of said company, to purchase and hold by deed for a term certain or in fee-simple lands and other real estate, and to carry on the business of mining for iron ore and other native minerals, and manufacturing and preparing the same for market; and to issue bonds not exceeding one half of the capital stock, upon such terms as may be deemed for the best interests of the company.

The seventh section provides—

That the president and directors are hereby empowered and fully authorized, on behalf of said company, to lease, demise, bargain, sell, and convey any lands and real estate which may be owned or held by said company, and to execute and deliver to purchasers good and sufficient deeds therefor.

The sixth section undertakes to describe the scope and power of this corporation to purchase and hold land, without limit and without location except at the pleasure of the company. It is not to acquire and hold land in the District of Columbia, but wherever they desire to purchase land; and then the next section authorizes them to sell any of these lands. Thus, under this charter, this company propose to accomplish what that magnificent scheme which was before Congress two or three months ago was proposed to accomplish—the National Land Association scheme; a grand combination of wealth to speculate in lands. Now, is it the purpose of Congress to authorize any company to become, without restraint, the owners of the real estate of the country? I do not know of a single State in the Union in which such a policy is tolerated. In the States incorporated companies are restricted in the acquisition of real estate to the purposes of the company. They are not allowed to buy and sell land for the purpose of speculation.

But where are these parties to mine and to manufacture their minerals? Not in the District, I take it; but they are to secure the consent of some State to do it in that State. Then we come back to the question, whether it is our right, under the spirit of the Constitution, to organize an artificial body, not with the purpose of doing anything in the District of Columbia, but for the purpose of doing something somewhere else; to create an artificial body, that that artificial body, in the name of Congress, may emigrate, leave the District of Columbia, and live and exercise its powers in one of the States of this Union, with the consent, I admit, of the State. I am not right sure that the assent of the State is necessary to enable an incorporated company to hold real estate. Is that entirely clear? I do not know; I would not say, without an examination of the question. Are Senators entirely satisfied that an incorporated company of the District of Columbia cannot become the owners of land in Illinois and in Indiana in the absence of an express prohibition of the State of Illinois or of the State of Indiana? Their ordinary powers cannot be exercised outside of the State or district where they are created. My objection to this bill is, that it proposes to make an incorporated company, not for the purposes or immediate necessities or wants of the District of Columbia; in other words, it is not legislation for the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRESWELL. I think this bill is not obnoxious to the objection which has been urged with so much force by the gentleman from California and just now by the gentleman from Indiana. They seem to mistake entirely the whole scope and object of the bill. It is simply an effort by certain gentlemen of the District of Columbia to induce capitalists from other sections of the country to unite with them in establishing a manufacturing establishment in the District of Columbia. They contemplate having their principal office of business in the District of Columbia. They propose to have a part at least of their manufacturing establishments in the District of Columbia; and all that they ask with regard to lands lying outside of the District is, that they shall be invested with the authority to hold such lands as may be necessary for them in carrying on the business established within the District.

The Senator from Indiana has asserted that the very object of this bill is to establish and carry on a business outside of the District, and not inside the District. In that he is altogether mistaken. The object of the bill is merely to vest this corporation with the power necessary to hold such lands as they may find to be essential to the proper carrying on of their business in the District of Columbia. They may desire to hold lands for the purpose of mining ore in the State of Virginia. They may desire to hold lands for the purpose of cutting wood and manufacturing it into coal in the State of Maryland. Without this express authority a doubt might be raised as to their capacity to hold land in the adjoining States, outside of the District. With regard to that, I hold that the Congress of the United States, being competent to establish a corporation, the corporation, when established, is vested with the rights of all other corporations established by competent authority, and that they have precisely the same legal powers as any corporation established by a State; and I think it is well settled that a corporation established by a State may hold lands outside of the State granting the act of incorporation, provided it be not inconsistent with the law of the State wherein the lands lie. Now, these gentlemen propose to invest in this manufacturing business one or two million dollars. They desire to have a charter that will enable them to raise this money. Their effort is, to be sure, to make money, as is common to all men.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As the Senator is probably familiar with the purposes of the corporations, I wish to ask whether it is the intention of these parties to carry on the mining business with the capital of a million or more in the District of Columbia or in one of the States.

Mr. CRESWELL. I will say to the gentleman that they propose to establish a part of their manufacturing system here.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Are they to manufacture anything and everything, and mine too?

Mr. CRESWELL. No, sir. They propose to manufacture, and to mine for iron ore and the minerals necessary to the proper carrying on of that business; for instance, limestone.

Now, sir, these gentlemen have in view—and I state it frankly—a very valuable tract of land in the State of Virginia, which is very rich in deposits of iron ore; and they desire, in connection with their establishment for manufacturing iron ore in this District, to be enabled to go into Virginia to buy that land, dig out that ore, bring it into the District, and have it manufactured here.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator one further question: if there be no law of Virginia or West Virginia prohibiting this corporation acquiring and holding land in the absence of a prohibition; in other words, will this company be authorized by the charter to acquire and hold lands in one of the States?

Mr. CRESWELL. I admit to the gentleman that they will not be authorized to hold lands against the policy and the laws of the State; but a doubt might arise as to whether they would be entitled to hold lands for the purpose of their business in the several States unless that right were given by the terms of their charter; and that is precisely the doubt we want to get rid of. What might be the policy of the State of Virginia or the State of Maryland I am not prepared to say; it might be liberal or it might not; but one thing is certain, it would be impossible for these gentlemen in the present state of the country, and especially in the present state of the State of Virginia, to derive from that State a charter that would enable them to go into the market and raise the money, because they would not have the means to afford proper security to carry on this business.

Now, with regard to the fears of my friend from California, that they propose to go there and engage extensively in the mining of gold, and all that, I do not suppose these gentlemen ever entertained such an idea. If people go to California and carry on the mining business in California they at once subject themselves to the laws of California; and if those laws are so prohibitory and illiberal as the gentleman seems to think, so that nobody outside of the State of California has a right to go there and dig from the lands of the General Government one solitary dollar, then these people will be at once excluded if the laws of the State be operative. I do think, sir, that the objections that gentlemen raise against this bill are not properly founded. Whatever might be the propriety of their objections as to the Congress of the United States entering upon a line of policy that would enable persons to come from all sections of the Union and to derive from a corporation granted by Congress powers which they intended to exercise exclusively in other States, I do not think this bill presents such a case as that those arguments are at all applicable to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, my attention was not called particularly to this bill until it was brought up for consideration today. I have heard the objections made to its passage, and I must confess that they have no considerable weight with me. I do not participate in the fears that have been expressed by Senators who oppose the passage of this bill. It has been emphatically pronounced vicious legislation; but I submit that no good reasons have been given to the Senate for the expression of that opinion. Suppose Congress, having exclusive jurisdiction to legislate for the District of Columbia, should pass a general act of incorporation providing that certain persons might incorporate themselves under that act to do any legitimate business. Many of the States have passed acts of that description. I think that system of legislation is preferable to special corporations. If there was such a law as that in this District then these persons could incorporate themselves to do the business which they propose to do by the terms of this bill. A, B, and C might file articles of incorporation declaring that their capital stock should be a certain amount, and that each share should be a certain amount, declaring where the principal office should be, and the business which they proposed to pursue, all of which is declared in this bill; and those persons so incorporated could then proceed and transact the business described in this bill, and they could own property elsewhere than in the District of Columbia.

Now, I suppose it will not be pretended that a corporation organized under the laws of a State is confined in the transaction of its business or in the possession of property to the limits of the State in which it is organized. Many corporations organized by the laws of the New England States do business on the Pacific coast; and I do not see why a corporation organized under the laws of Congress in the District of Columbia, an artificial person, may not own property outside of the District of Columbia as well as a natural person living in the District of Columbia. Suppose a man here living in the District of Columbia is worth $1,000,000, and he sees proper to engage in the business described in this bill, and he invests his money in mines in Virginia or Ohio or California or Oregon. Certainly he has a perfect right to do that, and nobody can complain. So if half a dozen individuals unite together, and their capital consists of $1,000,000, is there any reason why those half a dozen persons should not be allowed to engage in the same business that an individual residing within this District might engage in who happened to be worth $1,000,000?

It is said, why do not those persons living in the District of Columbia, who are organized into a company in this bill, go into the States where they want to do business and obtain the privilege from the State governments to transact their business? Many of the States, and I do not know but all of the States, require that where a company is organized by the laws of the State, that company shall have its principal place of business within the State, and that a certain portion of the stockholders or officers of the company shall reside within the State; and the laws of the State generally provide that citizens of the United States living in the District of Columbia cannot organize under the laws of the State unless they transfer all their business to those remote places and to States where they do not live.

Now, it is to be remembered that there are Territories of the United States where there are extensive mines, and those persons organized by this act into a company may go into the Territory of Montana and mine; they may go into the Territory of Washington or the Territory of Idaho and have and own mines. Is there any reason why Congress should not provide by an act of incorporation that citizens living in the District of Columbia may not go into the Territories of the United States, over which Congress has the power to legislate, and engage in mining business there? It seems to be assumed that this company is to be engaged in mining in a State. That may be true, and probably it is true. That would not be any objection to the bill, even if it was true, in my opinion; but if this company, organized for the purpose of transacting this business, should find that it cannot engage in this business within any particular State, then it might engage in the business of mining in some of the Territories of the United States where the business of mining is extensively prosecuted.

Now, sir, Congress is constantly engaged in organizing companies, granting charters of incorporation to individuals living elsewhere than in the District of Columbia, living in the different States and Territories. Railroad companies are organized. Several have been organized at this session of Congress. Persons have been incorporated for the purpose of constructing railroads in the different Territories of the United States. I believe a company has been organized to build a telegraph from the United States to the West India islands. The power which is to be exercised in this case is a power that is constantly exercised by Congress; and a bill is now pending here to organize a company to build a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara. Therefore the objection which is made to this particular bill, it strikes me, is one that cannot prevail at this time, unless Congress proposes to reverse all that has been done for a long time in reference to matters of this description. I think that it is the duty of Congress to promote as far as practicable the interests of the citizens of the District of Columbia, and that persons residing in this District should have the same opportunities to transact business as citizens residing within a State. Congress stands in the same relation to the people of this District that a State government does to the people of a State; and I undertake to say there is no State in this Union where these individuals, if they resided within that State, could not be organized, either by a special act of incorporation or under a general law of incorporation; there is no State in this Union where this bill might not become a law, either by a special act of legislation or under a general act of incorporation. It seems to me that the citizens of this District ought to have the same rights and privileges, and Congress ought to be as liberal as a State government would be to them if they resided in any State.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Maryland who called this bill up will allow it to be laid aside for the present. I have several small matters in charge that I desire to take up and dispose of this afternoon, and I trust that he will allow me to move the postponement of this bill until to-morrow, so that I may call up some other bills.

Mr. CRESWELL. Does the gentleman desire to move any amendments to the bill?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir; I desire to move an amendment to the bill. I do not wish to consume the whole day upon this one bill, and I hope, as this day was assigned particularly to the consideration of matters belonging to the District of Columbia, that I may be allowed to dispose of some other bills.

Mr. CRESWELL. If the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia desires to propose an amendment to the bill, I will consent to this postponement.

Mr. MORRILL. I will see if I cannot propose some amendment which will obviate the objections that have been brought against it.

Mr. CRESWELL. Very good, sir; with that understanding, I consent to the postponement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Senator from Maine moves that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills without amendment:

A bill (S. No. 360) to regulate the appointment of paymasters in the Navy, and explanatory of the act for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy;

A bill (S. No. 57) for the relief of the heirs of Lieutenant Joshua D. Todd, late of the United States Navy, deceased; and

A bill (S. No. 202) for the relief of Elisha W. Dunn, a paymaster in the United States Navy.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (S. No. 307) authorizing the restoration of Commander Charles Hunter to the Navy, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 447) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation to the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, for a public park;

A bill (H. R. No. 448) to authorize the construction of a railroad through certain land of the United States in Kansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 486) for the relief of Catherine Welch;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 158) providing for the settlement of accounts of W. H. Hamrick;

A bill (H. R. No. 683) for the relief of J. Judson Barclay;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 159) authorizing the Commissioner of Public Buildings to employ three additional watchmen in the Smithsonian grounds; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of William D. Nelson.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 87) to provide for the payment of bounty to certain Indian regiments; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 120) to extend to the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, of West Virginia, the provisions of the act approved July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States."

NEW YORK AND MONTANA COMPANY—VETO.

Mr. COOPER, the President's Private Secretary, appeared below the bar, and said:

I am directed by the President of the United States to return to the Senate, the House in which it originated, the bill (S. No. 203) to enable the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company to purchase a certain amount of the public lands not now in market, with his objections thereto in writing.

Mr. WADE. I move that the veto message of the President be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Chair will take this opportunity to lay before the Senate the veto message from the President of the United States.

The Secretary proceeded to read the message.

Mr. WADE. I move that the reading of the message be dispensed with, and that it be printed for the use of the Senate. It seems to me there is no occasion for reading it through.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

Mr. WADE. Nobody will attend to it if it is read, and it will take some time to read it. I think it had better be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I presume the Senator will not insist upon that. I hope we shall hear the message read.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of those who know, whether such a thing has ever been done in any former instance as not to read a veto message from the President of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. The last one we had was not read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, it was.

Mr. MORRILL. It was not read the day it was sent here; but it was ordered to be printed, and it was read the next day.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should really like to know whether such a thing was ever before known under any former Administration as refusing to read a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. WADE. The only reason why I moved to dispense with the reading of the message was that there are a good many other District bills to be acted upon, some of them very important, and time is very precious. It is hardly probable that we shall get another day on which to act upon them at this session. One or two of them it is almost indispensable should be passed, and if we have this message read it will take up a good deal of time. That is all I have to say about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the further reading of the message of the President of the United States be dispensed with, and that the message be printed and laid upon the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think if the Senator from Ohio will reflect upon it he will hardly insist upon that motion. It will take but a few minutes to read the message.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend it will be quicker to read it than to have a discussion as to whether it shall be read or not.

Mr. WADE. I believe it is consented now on all hands that the reading shall be dispensed with.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Indiana insists on having it read. I presume no one wants to be considered as acting discourteously in any way to the President. I think sometimes messages from the President of the United States have not been read, but have been ordered to be printed. That is my recollection since I have been here. But if anybody supposes that it will be a reflection on the President not to read it, I hope it will be read. I am sure nobody wants to treat the message disrespectfully.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It will not take more than ten minutes to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his motion?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir; I withdraw it. I suppose we are at the mercy of the President. The Secretary concluded the reading of the message.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the message be laid upon the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 447) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation to the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, for a public park—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (H. R. No. 448) to authorize the construction of a railroad through certain land of the United States in Kansas—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (H. R. No. 486) for the relief of Catherine Welch—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 150) providing for the settlement of the accounts of W. H. Hamrick—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (H. R. No. 683) for the relief of J. Judson Barclay—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 159) authorizing the Commissioner of Public Buildings to employ three additional watchmen in the Smithsonian grounds—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of William D. Nelson—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

COMMANDER CHARLES HUNTER.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 307) authorizing the restoration of Commander Charles Hunter to the Navy; which was in the first line of the bill to insert the word "States" after the word "United."

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 97.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the title of it?

Mr. MORRILL. "A bill in addition to the several acts for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States, and to resume the legislative powers delegated to the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the levy court in the District of Columbia."

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine if he has the conscience to call up such a bill as that at this period of the day?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not want to make it a matter of conscience if I can help it. [Laughter.] I do not propose to ask the Senate to consider the bill to-day, but I want to have the bill read, and at an early day I shall ask for the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On that question I wish to say just one word. I am one of the Senators who are anxious for an early adjournment, and I had intended, if the chairman of the Finance Committee had been here, to call up to-day the resolution of the House of Representatives for an adjournment, with a view to fixing some day. Now, the Senator from Maine may disclaim all obligations to conscience in regard to this bill; but I think it is a question of conscience to call up a bill of one hundred and two pages in respect to the District of Columbia, not having anything to do with the general interests of the country, at this period of the session, when we all want to get home, especially when we have to live in this hot-house.

Mr. MORRILL. I only want to have the bill read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I think we had better meet this question at this time. We cannot go into the question, at this session, of the entire reorganization of the government of the District of Columbia. I understand that this is an abandonment of the system which has governed this city for so many years. In considering this bill we have got to consider all the questions of government suitable to a city. We ought not to pass a bill of this kind with less than five or six days' consideration. It is a bill of one hundred and two pages, and is to be followed, I presume, by a bill of one or two or three hundred pages, remodeling the tax laws of the District. We shall not get away from here this summer if we undertake such jobs as this; and I appeal to the Senator to consider the question of conscience.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator did not understand me. I did not make this bill a matter of conscience. I said I did not want to make the question of taking it up a matter of conscience. I do not want the Senate to be frightened out of its sense of propriety by any suggestion of the honorable Senator from Indiana that there is no time to consider this bill. The bill is a little voluminous, I know; but it is a matter of detail simply. The principle of it is very simple. It is merely to confer on another set of functionaries the functions which are exercised by the municipal officers of three corporations in this District. The necessity for it is imminent. If there is anything like bad government, shameless government anywhere, it is in this District, and I am prepared to show it; and I shall show a case, too, and shall not require a great deal of time to do it, that will make the Senator from Indiana blush to undertake to oppose the measure. I know that decency is outraged in this District by these corporations; some of them particularly. I do not like to be told, when a bill has been five months on the tables of Senators, that there is no time to consider it, not even to read it.

Now, Mr. President, no more important measure scarcely is likely to be brought before this Congress in many a day than the one I now desire to call up. My honorable friend says that it is to overthrow the system which has obtained here since the organization of the Government. That is not so at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is to remodel it.

Mr. MORRILL. It is simply to resume the functions with which we began. It never was designed that the jurisdiction over this District, which was exclusive in Congress, should be conferred on three small corporations. Congress never will respect its dignity and its character, nor begin to perform its duty until it exercises the jurisdiction which was exclusively conferred upon it over this District. I should like to know of the honorable Senator from Indiana, if he has looked at this subject at all, how he undertakes to account to the American people for the outrageous abuses which have characterized the government of this District in the last fifteen or twenty years, patent to everybody; and by what authority the trust which the American people conferred upon Congress has been delegated in this way, or abused in this way, or neglected, if you please.

Sir, these are some of the topics to which I propose to address myself as a matter of conscience when the bill comes up. The question of conscience of which I spoke was simply the question of taking it up. The question involved in the bill is a matter of most serious consideration and of very great importance. There is nothing so frightful in its volume as that it ought to intimidate anybody. It is simply a proposition to divest these functionaries of their functions, and confer them upon men of our own appointment. There is not a single section or line of legislation in it beyond that. I do not propose to alter the law in any respect whatever except simply to take these functions out of the hands of the men who are now exercising them, and to confer them upon persons of our own selection.

Now, sir, the request that I make I do not think is an unreasonable one. The business of the District of Columbia has not occupied much time here. But a single half day before this, and not half of this day, have I had the good fortune to occupy, have we had during the six months that we have been in session. I want the bill now to be taken up and read, and then I hope at no distant day to get an opportunity to address myself to the Senate upon the subject of the bill. Having had that hearing, if the Senate conclude that it is too late, or they cannot act upon the bill, very well; but I insist upon it that the Senate ought to allow the bill to come up and be read. We have time enough to do that. I shall not require more than two thirds of the Senate to remain unless they choose to do so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not suppose that the Senator from Maine would feel authorized to discuss the merits of the bill upon the motion to take it up, and I do not now intend to follow him into that line of debate. For one, sir, I am not willing to sit here during the hot months of summer for the high purpose, which he says is the only object of this bill, to put out of office one set of officers and to put another set of men in. That is not a high purpose of Government.

Mr. MORRILL. I will ask the honorable Senator whether he thinks that is a fair representation of my argument. Have I said anything to authorize the assumption that the high purpose of this bill was simply to put out one set of officers and to put another in? I expressly said that no higher duty would rest on this Congress than to correct the abuses of administration that exist here, and that the way to do it was to remove the officers. That is what I said.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly, it is to put one set of men out of office that another set of men may come in. The Senator says that is the main purpose of this bill, to correct the misgovernment of this city and the other cities by a change of the functionaries. That is his statement. In other words, as he expresses it, Congress shall resume its power over the city of Washington and the other cities of this District; but how? Is it proposed that we shall be executive officers for this city? Is it proposed that Senators shall in their own proper persons give attention to the affairs of the government of this city? No, sir; but that Congress shall appoint a set of men to govern the people of the District, instead of the men whom the people of the District have elected; in other words, to abandon the popular government of the District, and to assume the government on the part of Congress. Instead of allowing the people to elect their own officers, to govern themselves according to laws which we prescribe, we propose in this bill, as I understand, to select the officers for this District. Is that a sufficient reason to take up a bill of one hundred and two pages at this period of the session? Who is to blame if this bill has lain for five months on the tables of Senators? Not myself. I am not aware of any blame anywhere; but if any blame attaches anywhere, I presume it attaches to the honorable Senator who has the measure in charge. He will hardly attribute any fault to me or to other Senators if he has not called his bill up.

There was another measure before this body proposing good government for the District. It came, as I understand, some months since from the House of Representatives, proposing still further to popularize the government of the District by throwing into the popular features of the government the negro vote. What has become of that? Now we have got to have one extreme or the other. The extreme that comes from the other branch of Congress is that everybody shall vote in the District, white and black. The proposition of the Senate committee is that nobody shall vote; that Congress shall resume its power of government over the District, and govern the District directly by the appointment of the officers. Is that desirable? Is it desirable that the legislative body shall become an administrative or executive body?

Mr. MORRILL. The bill does not propose that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought it did from what the Senator said.

Mr. JOHNSON. The President is to appoint the commissioners.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the bill so provide?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then it is not quite so objectionable as it would be if the legislative department undertook to make the appointment of officers. I understood the appointments were to be made by the Senate.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, is it in order to debate the merits of a bill on a motion to take it up?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I acknowledge the point of order made by the Senator from Ohio, and shall not pursue the subject further. My simple purpose was, in appealing to the conscience of the Senator from Maine, if possible to prevail on him not to press on the Senate at this period of the session, when we want to get home, the consideration of a measure which I cannot conceive it is very important that we should consider at this session. This District certainly can get along for another session of Congress without such legislation. I hope the bill will not be taken up. One hundred and two pages of legislation, a book to be legislated upon, is not to be disposed of in a day or so.

Mr. WADE. Let us have the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair feels it his duty to state that on a motion to take up a bill, extended discussion is not in order, but any reasons for or against taking it up are in order.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will deliberate long before they reverse the first principles of free government—elections by the people and the right to govern themselves in States, in Territories, in cities, and in towns. I understand this to be the first attempt made anywhere in the United States to reverse that system. In this bill it is proposed to govern this District by three commissioners. Do you expect that under them you will have any better government, or any more satisfactory government than you now have? Sir, it is taking the first step for the introduction of tyranny into the United States by disregarding the will and the suffrages of the people. I hope we shall never consider this bill.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the first Monday of December next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is not yet under consideration. The question before the Senate is on taking it up for consideration.

Mr. WILSON. I thought it was before us. I will simply say, then, that I hope it will be postponed. It is too important a measure to be taken up at this session. Besides all that, I agree very much with the Senator from Kentucky, and am in favor of taking up and passing the other bill that shall put the government of the District into the hands of the whole people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to take up this bill for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Now I make the motion that the bill be postponed until the first Monday of December next. I do not believe that a bill of this size can properly be considered at this session; but besides that I am very anxious to take up the other measure that shall invite all the people here to participate in the government of the District.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not propose to have this bill disposed of in that way exactly. If the Senator has had the bill under consideration and is opposed to it, very well. If he knows what is in this bill—

Mr. WILSON. I do not.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I think it is a very poor compliment to the judgment of the committee who reported it for the Senator to rise here and dispatch the bill in that summary way. If the Senator desires it to go to the Committee on Military Affairs, I have no objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not propose, after having given five or six months to the consideration of the bill, to have it disposed of so summarily, if I can help it. If the Senator wants to assign another day for its consideration during this session, very well. I said when I moved to take the bill up that I only wanted to have it read to-day. I am afraid there is not a Senator here who has read it. The honorable Senator from Kentucky says that this bill ought not to be considered because it subverts a fundamental principle of this Government. If the honorable Senator had read the bill probably he would not have made that remark.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Names do not change things.

Mr. MORRILL. The bill is to resume the functions which the Government began with. That honorable Senator ought to know that this District was put under the government of three commissioners when it was created. That was the bill with which it began, and it continued so substantially down to 1812. I propose to resume those functions. That is exactly what this bill does.

Now, about this principle of government, as applicable to the District of Columbia, the District of Columbia never was designed to be a government. It is a seat for the Government of the United States; and that is all it ever was designed to be. It never was intended to establish either a territorial or a State government in the District of Columbia. It was designed as a seat for the Government of the United States, and by the Constitution it was placed expressly and exclusively under the legislative jurisdiction of Congress. This bill proposes that Congress shall legislate directly for this District. That is all there is of it. As it is to-day, you have this District governed by four jurisdictions: first, Congress; second, the levy court, whose jurisdictions or limits nobody can define; third, the corporation of Georgetown; and fourth, the corporation of Washington. This District Committee is expected to reconcile the difficulties between these three corporations, and legislate to the end that this shall become the great capital, which it ought to be, of a great people. The experience of the committee is, that the thing cannot be done. The idea of leaving it to three corporations whose interests and pursuits are all aside from the interests of the Government is, in the nature of the thing, not to say absurd, but is inconsistent and incompatible with the very interests and duties which the Constitution devolves on Congress.

If I did not believe that the reasons of the committee would commend themselves to the consideration of the Senate, of course I would not ask the Senate to consider this bill; but I object to my honorable friend from Massachusetts dispatching so summarily a bill that has received the consideration that this bill has, unless he has formed some judgment upon it. If he has, very well. I am not aware of anything before the Senate why this bill should not be read now. If the honorable Senator desires to get his dinner at this hour, I will stay here and hear it read if nobody else does.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Maine has devoted several months to the consideration of this subject with all that industry that he bestows on matters of legislation here, which we all acknowledge. He knows all about the bill. He made it. It is his. It is a pretty large affair, however; and I must confess, through indolence or a multiplicity of engagements, I have not read it. I must confess further than that, that I dread to enter upon it. I want to take it home and study it through the dog days and take it up next December, in the cool weather, and act upon it then. I certainly mean no sort of disrespect to the Senator in the matter; and I confess that, not having read the bill, I, like many others, I take it, around me, am subject to criticism. But I propose that not only this but some other bills shall go over. I think one or two bills before my committee, if I have my way about it, will be postponed until the next session, for I think we shall have to put aside some of the least pressing matters. We cannot stay here all summer. I am, however, willing to gratify the Senator, if he desires to have this bill read and to address the Senate upon the subject, so that we shall have the advantage of his speech to study with his bill during the summer, and then put the matter over, for, I take it, that Senator does not expect that we are to stay here during these hot days and act upon this bill of over one hundred pages. I agree with him that this is not the best governed city in the world; but, somehow or other, it continues to get along. As to anything that is said or done by any of its officials, I take it it does not affect that Senator nor myself, nor any of us here. At any rate, I think we shall get through the next few months.

Then I am very anxious for the passage of another measure which I think ought to have been passed long ago—I mean no reflection on the Committee on the District of Columbia—and that is, the bill the House passed so promptly, extending the suffrage in the District. I think if we could bring the kindly, humane, patient, enduring, and charitable qualities of the negroes of Washington into the city government, to mingle with the people of this city and in the government of the city, we should elevate the government of this city very much. I believe that; and I am very anxious to pass that measure; but I am afraid if we enter upon this bill of one hundred and two pages, we shall not reach that little measure that does not make one page. However, I will withdraw my motion, and let the Senator dispose of the matter as he wishes; but certainly I think if he inflicts the reading of this bill upon us he ought not to compel us to sit here and act upon the bill now.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall come to a vote, and I will not prevent it long. I utterly object to the postponement of this bill until December next, or involving it with the question of negro suffrage in this District. I want the question of suffrage when it shall come up to stand on its own merits. I am not so sure as some other Senators may be, that if suffrage were extended in the District, the city of Washington would therefore get a better government. I am not so certain on that point. But enough of that when the question shall come up. I hope this bill will have consideration, notwithstanding its length; and therefore I move, as an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, if it be in order, that the bill be fixed as the special order for Wednesday next, so that we may then get a vote upon it.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CONNESS. Then, if it will suit the Senator from Maine, I move that this bill be made the special order for Wednesday next at one o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. You had better say Monday next.

Mr. CONNESS. No; we have got a special order for Monday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that this bill will not be made the special order for Wednesday, because I presume the chairman of the Committee on Finance will be ready by that time to proceed with the tax bill.

Mr. MORRILL. If he is, I will withdraw this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it is understood that this bill shall not interfere with the tax bill, I shall not object to the motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I should not expect it to interfere with that measure.

The motion was agreed to.

OBSTRUCTIONS ON MARKET SQUARE.

Mr. WADE. I now move to take up Senate resolution No. 101.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 101) directing the removal of certain obstructions from the public square known as Market square, in the city of Washington. It directs the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds to notify the party by whose direction obstructions, to wit, foundation and walls, were placed upon the public square near Pennsylvania avenue, known as Market square, to remove the same, and on refusal or neglect to remove them to cause them to be removed without unnecessary delay.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What committee does this resolution come from?

Mr. WADE. The Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Does it require the removal of the market house?

Mr. WADE. No; only the incumbrances there. The market is to be removed to another place. Another site has been found where it is to be established.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is what is called Center market?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir; I believe they call it Center market; but this resolution has nothing to do with the market. It merely directs the removal of the foundations that they have got there, which were unauthorized by Congress.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am not certain that I understand the object of this resolution. My attention was called this morning by some citizens of the District with whom I am acquainted to the matter, which I understand to be this: there has been for a good many years in this city a market house—

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator will allow me, this resolution has no relation to the market. It relates simply to the foundations and partial walls which were attempted to be constructed on that square some two or three years ago, and which Congress at that time prohibited. This resolution simply directs the removal of those obstructions.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I must say what I have to say about it. I understand, indeed I know, that for a great many years there has been at the corner of Seventh street and Pennsylvania avenue a market. I understand that an effort has been made to have the market removed from that site and placed upon some other site.

Mr. WADE. This has nothing to do with that question.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What foundations are these?

Mr. WADE. They are the foundations commenced there, I believe, for a market some time ago without any authority of Congress whatever. They have no right to be there, and they are a nuisance on the square.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then I suppose the question is this, and it seems to me there must be something in it: I understand the people of the city attempted at one time to put up a new, good, suitable building there for a market house, and that by some act of Congress they were restrained from doing it; that the foundation that is now spoken of is the foundation commenced for that purpose; and that the object now is to remove that foundation and prevent the building of any market house upon the present site. In the mean time an effort is being made to procure the location of a market house upon another site; and this resolution must look in that direction. This is determining that the site now occupied shall not continue to be occupied for that purpose. If it is to have that effect, it seems to me we ought to consider the matter carefully. I have information that I think is correct, that in the laying out of the plat of this city originally, the ground now occupied for a market house was indicated for that purpose specially. In the original laying out of the city this ground was to be laid out for that purpose, and it is so marked upon the original plat. It has been established for that purpose over forty years to my personal knowledge, and perhaps longer than that. Property has been purchased all round it with reference to this condition of affairs. Property constructed upon it and high to it was made more valuable because it was supposed to be the permanent location of the city market. Men invested large amounts of money for that reason. Unless this resolution be intended to affect that question, I cannot see what it can be intended for at all. I hope the matter will not be acted on hastily, but that we may be able to examine it and know what we are doing. I should be glad to have the resolution laid over until I can have time to examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make a motion to that effect?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do.

Mr. WADE. I hope no such motion will be made, or if made that it will not prevail. This whole question that the Senator makes, was foreclosed two years ago by Congress ordering this work to be stopped with a view to removing this market to a more convenient site. There is no open question on that subject, because Congress itself has already foreclosed it. This is what I suppose is really the substance of it: workmen were engaged there on this unauthorized work, and a large debt has accrued. Those workmen ought to be paid; their contracts require that they should be paid; but they are told they cannot get their pay until Congress come to the conclusion to remove it and until they should remove it; and under pretense of its not being removed after Congress has condemned it, after they have said it shall be removed, they are quibbling with their workmen and preventing their payment, because the foundation is yet suffered to remain there. Their workmen, poor men who have laid out their labor, have been praying us all the winter to do something to conclude this matter so that they can have their pay. Those who employed them are quibbling upon the idea that the foundation is there yet, and although it has been resolved that it shall be removed, it is not removed; Congress have not done the last act, and therefore they will not pay these workmen until it is done. Now, sir, we want an order by Congress that these obstructions shall be immediately removed. When that is done these poor men can get their pay; but until it is done they cannot. That is all there is of it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator from Ohio may be perfectly familiar with this matter, and may be prepared to vote upon it, but I, unfortunately, am not. The Senator from Ohio may know perfectly well all the matter about which he speaks, but I do not, and before I am called upon to vote directly upon this resolution I think I have a right to be informed fully in regard to it. Now, the Senator says that Congress two years ago pronounced upon this matter. They did so very indirectly, if at all. I have their action here before me, and possibly if the effect of what was then done had been fully understood it would not have been done as it was done. I do not think that a measure of this kind, affecting the material interests of individuals, I do not think that a question affecting the property of men who have, by our action for forty or fifty years, been led to invest their money, and who, in consequence of our action, have invested their money, should be shuffled off in this hasty and inconsiderate way.

Some two years ago, as I understand, the city, as I before said, undertook to build upon the site of the old market house here a good building and commenced the work for that purpose. Shortly after they had commenced the work, a resolution, which I have before me, was passed by Congress. This resolution, indirectly, was held by the then Secretary of the Interior to stop that work. It does not allude to that work directly at all; but it was passed, perhaps, as this resolution would have passed here had I not called attention to it, without inquiry, without question; and it was held by the then Secretary to be broad enough to cover the stoppage of that work. Since that time, as I am informed—I do not know that my information is correct—certain other parties have been making arrangements by which they seek to locate the market at some other place, thus increasing the value of the property adjoining that place largely, and thus decreasing the value of the property located around the existing market largely. Now, I wish to inquire and ascertain before I vote upon this resolution, whether this thing be so or not; and whether there is danger that the Senate shall be used, in its public action, to advance the private interests of one set of men and injure the private interests of another set of men without knowing what they are doing. I hope, therefore, that the Senator will allow me time to look into this matter and examine it. I will consent to have any day fixed for its consideration that the Senator may desire.

Mr. WADE. I am only anxious to dispose of this question because I think that I know that the wages of the workmen are hanging upon it, and it ought to be settled that they may get their pay; but if the Senator is not well informed on the subject, and takes a deep interest in it, of course I can do no less, so far as I am concerned, than permit him to take time to look into it, and I hope he will do it at a very early period, so as to enable us to settle the question definitely as soon as it can be done.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If the Senator will name a day for its consideration, I will agree to it.

Mr. WADE. It is not necessary to fix a day for its consideration. As soon as you are better informed on the subject I will call it up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall have a short executive session, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. I want to call up a small bill that will take no time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the Senator will call up no more bills to-day. There is no quorum here.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois withdraw his motion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. For that purpose I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 15, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GEORGE C. BALDWIN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ASSAULT UPON A MEMBER.

Mr. SPALDING. I rise to a question of privilege. I submit the following preamble and resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Whereas it is alleged in the public press that Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, a member of this House from the State of Kentucky, did, on the evening of Thursday, the 14th instant, commit an assault upon the person of Hon. JOSIAH B. GRINNELL, a member of this House from the State of Iowa, because of words spoken in debate in this House by the latter; and whereas said assault, if committed, was a breach of the privileges of this House and of the member assaulted: Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the subject, and to report the facts, with such resolution thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and the protection of its members; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses on oath.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] yield for a question?

Mr. SPALDING. I will hear the question, but I think the less said the better.

Mr. JENCKES. The preamble of this resolution says, "whereas it is alleged in the public press," &c. Will the gentleman from Ohio say from what newspaper he has derived his account of this transaction? I would like to know whether the resolution that he has offered was prepared upon the report of the transaction which I find in the National Intelligencer of this morning.

Mr. SPALDING. I will say to the gentleman that it was in part from the Intelligencer. I insist upon my demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble and resolution were agreed to.

BOUNTY TO INDIAN REGIMENTS.

Mr. BLAINE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back Senate joint resolution No. 87, to provide for the payment of bounty to certain Indian regiments, with a recommendation that it pass.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the Secretary of War be authorized and required to cause to be paid to the enlisted men of the first, second, and third Indian regiments a bounty of $100, under the same regulations and restrictions as now determine the payment of bounty to other volunteers in the service of the United States.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WYATT H. HAMRICK.

Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution providing for the settlement of the accounts of Wyatt H. Hamrick, deceased, late lieutenant and quartermaster of the thirty-ninth Ohio volunteers, which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be directed to settle the accounts of Hamrick upon equitable terms, and upon the best evidence available.

Mr. BLAINE. Lieutenant Hamrick was killed at the assault on Fort McAllister, after having received for large amounts of property, before Sherman made his great march across the State of Georgia; and the Quartermaster General recommends that this resolution be passed in order to facilitate the settlement of his accounts.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

in completing the arch of Tiber creek through the Botanical Garden, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DARLING. I move that, by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 360, entitled "An act to regulate the appointment of paymasters in the Navy, and explanatory of an act for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy," be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration at the present time.

There was no objection, and the bill was read a first and second time.

It provides that the appointments to be made under the act entitled "An act to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy," approved May 8, 1866, may be made from the number of acting assistant paymasters of the Navy who performed duty as acting assistant paymasters during the war, and who at the time of their appointment under this act shall not be over the age of thirty-two years.

The second section proposes to authorize the President of the United States to waive the examination of such officers in the pay department of the Navy as are on duty abroad and cannot at present be examined as required by law; provided that such examinations shall be made as soon as practicable after the return of said officers to the United States; and no officer found to be disqualified shall receive the promotion contemplated in the act referred to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the calling of committees for reports of a private nature.

LEAVENWORTH PUBLIC PARK.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back House bill No. 447, to authorize the Secretary of War to sell a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation to the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, for a public park, with amendments.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to sell one hundred acres of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation, in the State of Kansas, to the city of Leavenworth, in said State, for the perpetual use and benefit of said city for a public park at a price at which the land adjoining thereto was appraised and sold under treaty with Delaware Indians of May 6, 1854.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 448, to authorize the construction of a railroad through certain lands of the United States in Kansas, with amendments.

Mr. SPALDING. Is this a private bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is entirely private and local. It is a bill to construct a horse railroad through the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth.

The SPEAKER. It is a private bill.

CATHERINE WELCH.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back House bill No. 486, for the relief of Catherine Welch, with a substitute and a written report.

The substitute provides that Catherine Welch, widow of the late John Welch, of company E, twenty-sixth regiment Illinois volunteers, be authorized to receive the bounty, back pay, and allowances due to said John Welch, without being required to make other or further proof of his death than that already furnished.

Mr. COOK. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a bill for the relief of Catherine Welch, respectfully report:

That it has been proven to their satisfaction that said Catherine Welch was the wife of John Welch, late a private in company E, twenty-sixth Illinois volunteers; that he enlisted August 2, 1861, served three years faithfully, reenlisted as a veteran, served until October 10, 1864, when he was sent to a hospital at Ronce, Georgia, suffering from a disease of the eyes, which rendered him nearly blind. In the same month he was transferred to a hospital at Nashville, Tennessee. On the way the train was attacked by guerrillas and thrown from the track; said Welch was bruised in the wreck of the cars, and in which the fight took place between the guerrillas and the soldiers on the train he was shot through the left thigh; his comrades conveyed him to Nashville and left him in hospital November 3, 1864, since which time there is no record of any kind concerning him, either in hospital or elsewhere, nor has he been heard from by his family or friends. That a diligent search by the captain under whom he served was wholly ineffectual, no trace of him could be found after his entrance into the hospital; his back pay and bounty have never been applied for. It was also proven that said Welch was a respectable man, of good habits, and attached to his family, and that his wife and family are now in great destitution. The committee are satisfied that said John Welch is dead, and report a bill authorizing the bounty, back pay, and allowances due to him to be paid to his widow.

The substitute was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The joint resolution provides that there be paid to the claimant $1,000 for services in recruiting for the Union Army in East Tennessee during 1861 and 1862.

Mr. BLAINE. There is an accompanying report, which I ask to be read.

The report was accordingly read. It shows that Mr. Nelson made sixteen trips from East Tennessee to the rendezvous of the Union troops in Kentucky, a distance of one hundred and seventy-five miles, over rugged mountains, and piloted at each trip from one hundred to one hundred and thirty troops, and in the undertaking was subjected to great personal danger.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL DOMINICA.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the same committee, reported adversely on House bill No. 534, for the relief of Samuel Dominica; which was laid on the table.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The morning hour having expired,

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following concurrent resolution relative to the constitutional amendment:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to transmit forthwith to the Executives of these several States of the United States copies of the article of amendment proposed by Congress to the State Legislatures to amend the Constitution of the United States, passed June 13, 1866, respecting citizenship, the basis of representation, disqualification for office, the validity of the public debt of the United States, &c., to the end that the said States may proceed to act upon the said article of amendment, and that he request the Executives of the States that may receive the said amendment to transmit to the Secretary of State certified copies of such ratification.

Mr. LE BLOND. Does that resolution come in by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asked unanimous consent to introduce it.

Mr. LE BLOND. And unanimous consent has not been given. I will state to the gentleman that the resolution is wrong on its face. It requires the Executive to immediately send copies of the proposed constitutional amendment to the different States, before the time allowed for the Executive to approve or reject this amendment has elapsed.

I am told by gentlemen here that the Executive is not required to sign this constitutional amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a point of order. I desire to know whether there is anything properly before the House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] states that he reports this from the committee on reconstruction, of which he is a member, then it is before the House.

Mr. LE BLOND. I understand that the Constitution provides that all bills and joint resolutions shall be sent to the Executive for his approval or rejection, and that no exception is made in regard to a constitutional amendment; and the practice has been to submit constitutional amendments to the Executive.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman say when?

Mr. LE BLOND. Under the administration of Mr. Buchanan there was a constitutional amendment submitted to the Executive and was approved by him. And during the administration of Mr. Lincoln there was also a constitutional amendment passed and submitted to the Executive for approval.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would ask the gentleman whether he is aware of the fact that the twelve constitutional amendments reported by the First Congress of the United States were never submitted to or approved by the President.

Mr. LE BLOND. I am aware that in the early history of this country the record shows nothing upon the subject. That is the truth about it; it does not show that they were approved or rejected, or that they went to the Executive or did not go. But it is a fact, and the gentleman cannot escape it, that the Constitution makes no exception in the matter whatever.

Now, what objection is there to changing this resolution so that it shall require, in the event that the Executive shall approve the constitutional amendment, that he shall send copies of the same to the Governors of the States? I hold that the Constitution is explicit upon the subject, and that while it requires a two-thirds vote upon a proposed constitutional amendment, it does not become effective until it has the approval of the President.

As the object of this resolution is to avoid another veto from the Executive, I shall object to its introduction at this time, and when it comes in—

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman objects why does he argue it?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] makes the point of order, as the Chair understands he does, that the amendment must be submitted to the President—

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not raise that point.

Mr. BINGHAM. What point, then, does the gentleman raise?

Mr. LE BLOND. I intend to raise the point when it does come before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] as having raised the point of order on the specific grounds stated by him. The argument that he has made is based upon the objection, and the Chair holds that the objection, if based on those grounds, is not good. The Chair has the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States for his decision, and supposing that the question would come up he has procured the authority, and now has it before him.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Supreme Court never decided a question of order in this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania certainly does not understand the decision of the Chair or he would not have made the remark.

The question was raised distinctly in 1803, in the Senate of the United States, on a motion that the then proposed amendment should be submitted to the President:

"On motion that the Committee on Enrolled Bills be directed to present to the President of the United States for his approbation the resolution which has been passed by both Houses of Congress proposing to the consideration of the State Legislatures an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the mode of electing President and Vice President thereof, it was passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 23."

On a distinct vote of 23 to 7, the Senate voted that the Committee on Enrolled Bills should not present the proposed amendment to the President of the United States for his approval, and it was not presented to or approved by him.

In 1798 a case arose in the Supreme Court of the United States, depending upon the amendment to the Constitution proposed in 1794, and the counsel in argument before the court insisted that the amendment was not valid, not having been approved by the President of the United States. The Attorney General, Mr. Lee, in reply to this argument said:

"Has not the same course been pursued relative to all other amendments that have been adopted? And the case of amendments is evidently a substantive act, unconnected with the ordinary business of legislation, and not within the policy or terms of investing the President with a qualified negative on the acts and resolutions of Congress."

The court, speaking through Chase, Justice, observes:

"There can surely be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation. He has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution."

And the court would not hear an argument from the Attorney General on the point, it was so clear.

The Chair has still another authority. During the last Congress a proposition of amendment to the Constitution was submitted to the President of the United States, Mr. Lincoln. It was sent back by him with the remark that he thought he had no right to sign it officially, but inasmuch as it was presented to him he would sign it.

Thereupon the following resolution was submitted to the Senate by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of that body, [Mr. TRUMBULL:]

"Resolved, That the article of amendment proposed by Congress to be added to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the extinction of slavery therein, having been inadvertently presented to the President for his approval, it is hereby declared that such approval was unnecessary to give effect to the action of Congress in proposing said amendment, inconsistent with the former practice in reference to all amendments to the Constitution heretofore adopted, and being inadvertently done, should not constitute a precedent for the future; and the Secretary is hereby instructed not to communicate the notice of the approval of said proposed amendment by the President to the House of Representatives."

Upon that resolution Senator REVERDY JOHNSON said:

"Now, the proposition is that no proposal by Congress of an amendment to the Constitution, although receiving the support of two thirds of both Houses of Congress, is to be submitted to the States unless the President shall approve it. That is not the case in relation to the other mode of proposing amendments. There being two modes, and stated in the alternative, the other mode is:

"Or on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States."

What are Congress to do then? Suppose two thirds of the States propose amendments, has the President anything to do with that? All will admit that he has not. Has Congress anything to do with that? All will admit that their single duty then is an imperative duty to call a convention. So that the whole object of the clause, as it seems to me, is merely to begin a mode by which the people shall have an opportunity of deciding whether the Constitution shall be amended or not. But when, as is stated by the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, every amendment which has been adopted has been submitted to the States without having been approved by the President, and when the Supreme Court, at a time when it stood as high as it has ever stood at any time since its organization, refused even to hear an argument on the subject, supposing it to be too clear for discussion, it would seem to me that we ought to consider the question as settled."

And such was the decision of the Senate, which adopted the resolution of Mr. TRUMBULL, without a division or even a call of the yeas and nays.

The Chair will state in response to the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that this is a parliamentary point. It is a question as to whether the Committee on Enrolled Bills of this House, where the joint resolution proposing the amendment in question originated, should present the same to the President for his signature. And the Chair has decided that such a course of proceeding is not in accordance with the Constitution and the uniform usage heretofore, except in the single case of the last Congress, when the proposed amendment abolishing slavery was submitted by inadvertence to President Lincoln for his signature. Therefore an objection based specifically on that ground could not be tacitly allowed by the Chair as correct, and is not a valid objection to the consideration of this concurrent resolution at this time.

Mr. LE BLOND. With all deference to the opinion of the Chair, and the authorities he has cited, I desire to say that the question the Chair has presented is entirely a new one, but not the one I made. The objection I make is to the reception of the resolution at this time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I object to the gentleman's discussing the resolution. And I give notice that I will introduce it on Monday next under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to be heard a moment in reply to the speech of the Speaker.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

JONATHAN BALL.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I call for the regular order.

The House, agreeably to order, resumed the consideration of House bill No. 550, for the relief of Jonathan Ball.

Mr. MYERS. When this bill was under consideration on last Wednesday, I withdrew my demand for the previous question in order that several gentlemen might be heard. I propose now to renew the demand for the previous question. If it shall be seconded, I will yield for any interrogatory which any gentleman may desire to propound.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to enter anew into the discussion of this bill at this time; but I wish to ascertain whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] will not consent to a postponement of the bill for a few days. The gentleman seems to think that I was mistaken in certain statements which I made to the House the other day; and what I desire is an opportunity either to convince him that I was right or to say to the House that I was wrong. I am quite confident that I was correct in those statements; but if the gentleman will consent to the postponement of the bill for a few days, I shall be in possession of evidence which will show that either he is mistaken or I am in reference to the facts of this case.

Mr. MYERS. I must decline to yield—

Mr. DAWES. I submit to the gentleman that there is nothing so pressing in the character of the case as to render it absolutely necessary to urge the House to vote upon it at this time—

Mr. MYERS. I must interrupt the gentleman. I have already said that if the previous question be seconded I will yield for any interrogatory. I now insist upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman will allow me to make a single remark. He does not appear to appreciate the suggestion which I make. I suggest to him that there does not appear to be any necessity for insisting upon the previous question at this time; that there is in the nature of the bill nothing requiring that we should vote upon it to-day. I simply ask the gentleman to consent to the postponement of the consideration of the bill till next week, when I flatter myself I shall be able to convince the House, beyond the peradventure of a doubt, that the statements which I have made with reference to the character of this patent, and its fruits during the twenty-one years of its continuance, are entirely correct.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] yield the floor? If so, to whom?

Mr. MYERS. I have demanded the previous question, and I decline to yield at present to any one.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 21, noes 55; no quorum voting.

Mr. MYERS. I withdraw for the present the demand for the previous question, and will make a brief statement, which I think will be satisfactory to the House.

Mr. Speaker, when this question was before the House the other day, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] occupied a considerable portion of time, yielded to him by me, in a statement that I was mistaken in saying that this bill had passed the Senate in the last Congress, had come to this House, had been unanimously reported upon favorably by the Committee on Patents of this House, and only failed here for lack of time. That gentleman then took it upon himself to say that the bill had been considered in the House, and after a full and fair discussion had been voted down. That is a mistake; and the gentleman does not need any time to send to private parties in Massachusetts to learn whether that was a mistake, because the Globe shows that just what I stated is true; that the bill was reported in this House on the last night of the session by the chairman of the Committee on Patents, and the gentleman from Massachusetts objected to its consideration.

Yet the gentleman endeavors here to-day, as he endeavored the other day, to create a prejudice against the bill by asking time, when he has had plenty of time, and stating that he can obtain evidence perhaps in a week that I was mistaken. The Globe will show what I state to be true, that on the last night of the session the bill was reported; that consent was asked for its consideration; that because of the gentleman's objection it went over; and Congress adjourned without reaching the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will occupy but a few moments more in the discussion of the merits of this bill; and I call the attention of every member to the statement which I am about to make.

Sir, during three sessions of Congress the Committee on Patents have reported favorably on only three bills. It is usual to attach some importance to the report of a committee, even if it be only the report of a majority of the committee; but here you have a unanimous report in favor of this bill; a committee, as I have said, and I take credit to the committee for it, that during three sessions of Congress has in similar cases only reported favorably on three of them. I conceive this to be a fact which ought to commend the bill at once to the attention of the House.

The ordinary life of a patent, until a late act, was fourteen years. When, however, it was found that a patent was new and useful, and the inventor had not, in the opinion of the Commissioner of Patents, received sufficient compensation, it has been customary, and such, indeed, is the law, for the Commissioner to grant an extension for seven years. It is in rare cases Congress is called upon to act, or rather that the Commissioner of Patents is called upon to act favorably in reference to a further extension. And it should be of rare occurrence.

Now, it is proved that this patent has not had its full life before the public, and, although it was highly beneficial, still it was eleven years before it came fairly before the public, so great was the prejudice against it. At first, so great was the prejudice against it, parties had to give bonds, running from five to twenty years, against loss in its use. The prejudice was strong in favor of the old iron water-pipes and against this patented article. I understand the constituents of the gentleman from New York on my left had to give a bond running for twenty-five years before he could lay it down.

The House will readily perceive that these water-pipes had to lie in the ground for years before the public could be entirely satisfied in reference to their merits. The committee had before it pipes which had lain in the ground for thirteen years, and which when taken up were found to be in as perfect condition as when put down. It has also had before it cast-iron pipes which had been ten years in the ground at the Boston water-works, and the evidence was incontrovertible that these old iron pipes were not fit for public use, if not injurious to the public health. It was found that by means of the cement in these patented pipes corrosion, incrustation, and diminution of the capacity of water-pipes were prevented. It is an invention of great public benefit, but it was a long time before its merits were made known so that the patentee could take advantage of his patent.

That, sir, is the whole case. The Senate committee reported favorably on it, and it passed the Senate. It came to this House, and has met the unanimous approval of the Committee on Patents. There is no objection to it except from one man, perhaps the one referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who came before us and endeavored to show that this was not an original invention, but that some other was. The question of originality was not one for Congress, and we said he could go before the courts to test the question which was original and which was not. We had nothing to do with that, our business being with this application.

Why, sir, it has been shown that this inventor has not made any more out of this patent during its whole life than might be made out of one contract. It was our duty, therefore, to see that this man was properly recompensed. The public generally desire that he should have this measure of justice. Although public notice has been given, no objection has been made to this extension except the one to which I have referred.

This pipe has only been laid in thirty-three towns. It will be of immense service if this inventor be allowed to put it down in other places.

I think the reasons I have given are sufficient. I will yield now to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has remarked the Committee on Patents have made but few reports in favor of the extension of expired patents. The cases brought to their attention are necessarily exceptional, and this, as the committee has determined, is one of the most remarkable exceptions. This man invented a mode of manufacturing pipes for the introduction of water into towns and cities. He came into competition with the article already in the market and the public were unwilling to take hold of it unless it was guaranteed to do good service for twenty years. The ordinary life of a patent is fourteen years, and, with an extension, twenty-one years, as in this case. The parties who manufactured this pipe were required to give the purchasers bonds that it would exist in good condition for twenty years.

It seemed to us very much like a case where a man invents something by which human life could be prolonged for a hundred years. His patent for fourteen years was of very little service, because no one would purchase an article which required so many years to test it.

We have reported in favor of this, that this inventor may go to the Commissioner of Patents, and if he can make out the case that he made out at the termination of his original term of fourteen years, that he had not received the compensation to which he was entitled, the Commissioner shall grant him a further extension of his time.

One word now to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] The committee gave notice last Congress to all who wished to come in and contest the question, and show why this bill should not be favorably reported. But one person came. I presume the person that the gentleman represents, and upon interrogation he admitted that he was an infringer on this man's invention and that he knew he was an infringer, and that if the patent was extended he would have to pay license or royalty. That was the only ground on which he wished the committee to report against the extension. He said that he could contest the validity of the invention, but the references he gave us were so ridiculous that when reviewed in his presence he withdrew it as too frivolous a plea to stand.

Mr. MYERS. I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR.]

Mr. TAYLOR. I desire to ask the gentleman if he claims that the inventor of this patent has been a loser by it.

Mr. MYERS. The report in the case is very full, but I will now state that we found that he has not been sufficiently compensated, but on the contrary very poorly compensated.

Mr. TAYLOR. The report seems to be very frank. It says that he has received $20,481.

Mr. MYERS. Read the balance of the paragraph.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will do so. It is as follows: "And allowing $1,000 the year for the last seven years for his expenses in traveling, and services in and about his interest," &c., "he has only about thirteen thousand dollars left for all he has realized from his patent."

Mr. MYERS. Only $13,000.

Mr. TAYLOR. I should think he had been very fairly compensated, and that is a very frank acknowledgment on his part.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WARD. I desire to ask leave of absence for Mr. ROUSSEAU for one week.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed as the select committee on the assault on Hon. JOSIAH B. GRINNELL the following gentlemen: Messrs. REFUS P. SPALDING of Ohio, NATHANIEL P. BANKS of Massachusetts, JOHN HOGAN of Missouri, HENRY J. RAYMOND of New York, and JAMES K. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania.

JONATHAN BALL—AGAIN.

Mr. JOHNSON. This case was before the Committee on Patents during the Thirty-Seventh Congress, when I was upon the Committee on Patents. I had great doubts whether there was any merit in the claim, and it struck me then that it ought not to be reported favorably upon, for this reason: that this improvement in the material of these water-pipes of twenty years' standing was not one that appealed favorably to Congress to give the control of it to one party.

The great argument in favor of the bill is that the patentee was unable to satisfy the public of the usefulness of his invention, and therefore could not make as much money as he expected. Why, sir, he had as much trouble in satisfying the committee as he had the public at large, and therefore the claim went overboard.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I think this claimant is at least entitled to a vote. He is of age, for he has been here twenty-one years. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I again appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] to allow me to make a motion to postpone the further consideration of this bill for one week.

Mr. MYERS. The gentleman appeals to me to permit a postponement of the bill for one week. Let me say that this bill has been upon the Calendar for two months. The gentleman only asks its postponement in order that he may verify some of the statements which he made the other day. I have taken upon myself to contradict those statements, in so far as they refer to the fact of this question being acted upon in the House before. Sir, the Globe will show that this House never did act on this question, either in the last Congress or in any other Congress. They never voted on the merits. They never voted, either for this bill or against it. This is the first time it has been before the House for action. I prefer, therefore, that it should not be postponed. I think that these parties are entitled to action, without being required to wait to see if, peradventure, the gentleman from Massachusetts can bring up anything against this just claim.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to think that I want time to show what was done in the last House upon this question. Sir, that is a matter of the smallest possible consequence. I stated to the House the other day that this bill was voted down in the last House. The gentleman says that it was not brought up. That is the only difference between him and myself. The fact is that the bill was brought up by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] on the last night but one of the session. He asked unanimous consent to report it, and I objected. He then asked a vote of the House on a motion to suspend the rules to enable him to report it, and the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. JENCKES. The House refused to suspend the rules, and came to no vote upon the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I will not enter further into that question. If my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] refuses to postpone the bill, he will drive me into a discussion of its merits very much against my will; for the reason that if it be postponed I think I can show the House that the owner of this patent has been remunerated, and very largely remunerated, by the use of it for twenty-one years.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] has referred to the party whom I represent here. Now, I wish to be entirely frank about this matter. There is a large interest growing up in my district that has been paying a "royalty" to this patentee during the whole existence of the patent. There is a similar interest growing up in the district of one of my colleagues and there is a similar interest springing up in the western country. I represent my constituents, and them solely. They have never been here nor have they said one word upon this subject. No constituent of mine has ever been within the District of Columbia to lobby in relation to this matter. The gentleman has had somebody from New York before his committee in relation to it. What I know upon this point I know from my constituents at home.

I have stated to the gentleman that if he will give me a week, I will bring evidence to show that this bill ought not to pass; no evil can arise out of that delay. But the gentleman declines to submit to a postponement, and I am therefore compelled to go into the merits of the case. I ask the House to look at the report. The report shows, and I ask the House to notice it, that the only reason for giving an extension of this patent is, that the owner of the patent has not received a fair remuneration. The committee state that this Mr. Jonathan Ball has received for his patent, in all, only $20,431.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that is a correct statement; and that is all that he has received; but he leaves out two very important items, and I wish to call the attention of the House to them. He says that he formed a combination with certain individuals, and held stock in corporations thus formed; and he says that he sold out all his stock in the company thus formed but ten and a half shares; and that all he has realized, both from the sale of the said stock and his own operations with his patent, is $20,431.

Let me read his statement:

"That Mr. Ball has sold all of his stock in the company except ten and a half shares, worth eighty per cent., $810, which, with all he has realized, both from the sale of his said stock and his own operations under his patent, amounts to only $20,431."

That leaves unaccounted for two very important items, namely, all the dividends he ever received from his stock, and also all that the owners of the other three fourths of the patent have received from the patent. This Jonathan Ball divides his patent into four parts, and for the one quarter of the patent which he reserved for himself he has received, aside from dividends, over $20,000. The other three fourths of the patent are not accounted for. Now, if one quarter of the patent has realized $20,000, I do not think it will require much argument or calculation to show that four fourths must have realized $80,000.

Mr. MYERS. I would inquire how much of my hour there is left.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-four minutes.

Mr. DAWES. I think I ought to be allowed time to thoroughly discuss this matter. I begged the gentleman to allow this subject to be postponed; but he will neither consent to the postponement nor permit me time to explain the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] why he desires to have this bill postponed?

Mr. DAWES. I have already stated to the House that if I had time I would bring forward ample proof that the patent in question had realized a fortune.

Mr. MYERS. I will allow the gentleman twenty minutes more of my time.

Mr. DAWES. I prefer to take my seat and appeal to the House to allow me the floor in my own right.

Mr. MYERS. In order that this matter may be disposed of at this time by the House, and not be postponed and take up another hour or two, as we know all the facts now, I will yield to the gentleman. I am perfectly prepared to meet the case now on its merits.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] surrenders the remainder of his time—as he has had two hours upon this bill—as soon as his hour expires the Chair will recognize some member opposed to the bill as entitled to the floor in his own right.

Mr. MYERS. I will yield to the gentleman all the remainder of my time but five minutes.

Mr. DAWES. How much time will that be?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] has twenty-four minutes of his hour still remaining.

Mr. DAWES. I am obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for yielding to me. I have explained that this paper shows that one fourth of this patent has yielded over $20,000. I understand the answer to that is, that the sum mentioned was all that Jonathan Ball has received. But the patent has yielded so much, of which three fourths have gone to the corporation.

But there is something further. We have this very Congress exempted this pipe from the internal revenue tax. And why? Because it had become free to the public by reason of the expiration of the patent, and men have engaged in the manufacture of it all over the country. And now what does this corporation ask? That the whole monopoly of the manufacture of this pipe shall be put into their hands for seven years longer; for this bill, if passed, would be equivalent to an enactment to that effect.

It is said that this is solely for the benefit of Jonathan Ball, without reference to his assignees. Well, sir, if it is to be for the benefit of Jonathan Ball, it is either with or without the consent of the corporation to whom he conveyed three fourths of his patent. Now, I am prepared to show that he transferred this patent with all renewals to this corporation; and, therefore, the moment you grant this extension to Jonathan Ball, it inures to the benefit of this corporation. But I do not care for that.

If this extension is to be given to Jonathan Ball alone, with the consent of the corporation, it is because Jonathan Ball and the corporation understand each other, and the moment the patent is granted all the rest of the world will understand it; too, when they are compelled to pay royalty to this corporation through the name of Jonathan Ball. If it is done without the consent of this corporation, then it comes to this, that after Jonathan Ball has sold three fourths of his patent, of his right to this manufacture under the law, which the world knew would expire in twenty-one years, when they would have the use of it as freely as they have the right to breathe, it is proposed to cut off their right to it and give the monopoly for seven years longer to Jonathan Ball.

Now, as I have said in reference to my constituents, and as I happen to know in reference to the constituents of one of my colleagues, and also two or three other establishments in the western country, they have gone into the manufacture of this pipe. But it is said that it is proposed here to save their rights. What sort of rights? Simply to protect them in what they have done between the expiration of the patent and the date of its renewal. That means that when this patent comes to be renewed every establishment in the land engaged in this manufacture, which was lawful when they put their capital into it, must close their doors until they can make terms with this corporation in New Jersey, in the name of Jonathan Ball. Every manufacturing establishment in the country which has invested capital in this work, knowing that the law of the land made it free to them from last December, at the date of the renewal of this patent must close its doors and make such terms as it can with this corporation or with Jonathan Ball. Now, as I have said, we at this very session took the internal revenue tax from this pipe for the benefit of the consumer, and not for the benefit of this corporation.

Now, if time be allowed, it will be easy to show the correctness of all I have stated here. I only asked time of this House that I might assure myself that I had made no misstatement to the House. It was not that I had any doubt myself, because the letters which I have received from my constituents, and which others here have received from theirs, leave me no room to doubt.

Now, I submit that there is a principle involved in this question which should arrest the attention of this House: that is, after we have given a monopoly of this patent to Jonathan Ball and his assignees for twenty-one years, and compelled the public to pay royalty to them, and the wise and sound policy of the Government is to stimulate and encourage enterprise and the investment of capital in all undertakings that will contribute to the advancement of the interests of the country, whether we will spring a trap like this upon all such enterprise, and confer a monopoly like this for seven years longer. I trust the House will not consent to it.

Mr. MYERS. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] had added to his remarks that he trusted that hereafter there would be no Committee on Patents in either House of Congress, perhaps the members of that committee, if not the public, would have been obliged to him.

I have listened to the gentleman attentively; I have given him all the time he desired, and what he said at the end of that time is just what he said at the beginning, and amounts to nothing as an argument against this patent. The statements reported by the committee have not been controverted, that this patent has not had a full existence before the public; that this is an exceptional case; that no matter what may have been the case before, if this extension is given it will be for the sole benefit of Jonathan Ball; that this inventor is a public benefactor and has not been rewarded properly.

Now, if this House could see the samples presented to the Committee on Patents, the one a specimen of the old iron pipe, taken up after a few years all incrustated with rust and dangerous to health, the other a sample of the patented pipe taken up after thirteen years in good condition; if they could hear the affidavits before us that this article did not get into public use generally during the existence of the patent; that up to this time but thirty-three towns and villages in the United States have been induced to use it and the public now desire to use it—if they had all that before them, I think they would vote to sustain the committee, as I hope they will now.

The objection amounts to this: a gentleman appeared before the committee who claimed that he had a better right to the patent. We thought he ought to try that fact, and we referred him to the courts. It is no argument against this bill to say that this or that company has entered into this business. But if there be such we guard their rights, while we say to this public benefactor that as the public did not appreciate his invention at first, that years had to expire before its merits could be tested, he shall have the benefit of his great invention for seven years longer, and so far as our votes go he shall have the chance for compensation the law originally intended he should have.

I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS,] with the understanding that when he shall have concluded his remarks he will renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS. I will do so.

Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that the report of the Committee on Patents is liable to one prominent objection. I am willing to do whatever is just and necessary for the protection and encouragement of inventive genius; but where the inventor, from the nature of his invention or from carelessness, suffers his patent to expire so that the right to use it becomes public property, I think we should never grant to any such inventor any extension whatever without fully and completely guarding all the rights of those who may have engaged in the manufacture of the article after the patent had expired.

By reference to the bill I find the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to hold responsible any persons who may have made or used said invention between the expiration of the patent and the approval of this act.

Now, when did this patent expire?

Mr. DAVES. It expired in December last.

Mr. DAVIS. Persons have engaged in the manufacture of this article; as soon as the patent expired men embarked their capital in the manufacture of these water-pipes, and there is in this bill no greater protection afforded to their interests than that which I have just read. The moment the patent expired it became public property. Capital was invited under the law to invest in the manufacture. This Congress, therefore, has no right to say to those who embarked their capital in it that they shall be subject hereafter to this proposed heavy tax. Congress has no right to say to those who have engaged in this manufacture that they shall immediately stop operations or agree to the terms dictated by the parties for whose benefit this bill is passed. I believe in no such legislation as that.

I do not know that I have anything further to say, except to refer to the fact that we are all aware inventors as a general thing secure the full benefit of their inventions, as they generally sell out to others. Such is the history of inventive genius. In this case, the party having secured his patent under the laws of the United States, parted with three fourths of his interest in it, and therefore this legislation is mainly for the benefit of his associates. I now, as I promised to do, call for the previous question.

Mr. DAVES moved that the whole subject be laid upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 28.

Mr. MYERS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVES moved to reconsider the vote by which the whole subject was laid upon the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. MYERS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered. The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution H. R. No. 143, making an appropriation for the repair of the Potomac bridge; when the Speaker signed the same.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The House then resumed, as the special order, the consideration of bill of the House No. 543, to restore to the States lately in rebellion their full political rights, upon which Mr. RAYMOND was entitled to the floor.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, I understand there are one or two other gentlemen who desire to be heard on this subject at this time, and as it will suit my convenience better, and I presume that of the House as well, to say what I have to say on Monday next. I yield the floor for the present; and I hope it will be the understanding the subject shall go over until Monday next, when I shall have the floor. I suppose to-morrow will be devoted to general debate on the President's message. I make that motion now.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the discussion of this bill go on to-morrow.

Mr. RAYMOND. I prefer myself to speak on Monday instead of to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen desire to be heard as in Committee of the Whole on the President's message. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] is entitled to the floor if to-morrow be set apart for general debate.

Mr. RAYMOND. I understand that according to the usage, members who speak to-morrow can address themselves to any subject they choose. I move that to-morrow be set apart for that purpose.

Mr. ORTH obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the consideration of this bill is not finished on Monday after the morning hour, it will then come in behind the Army bill, which, by unanimous consent, is made the special order for Tuesday, and every day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. RAYMOND. If it is necessary I will move that this bill be considered on Monday, and that it retain its place as the special order.

The SPEAKER. It will remain the special order, only if the debate is not concluded upon it it will then come in behind the Army bill, as that will come up on Tuesday to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. ORTH. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the bill by inserting at the end of line ten, on page 3, the following proviso:

Provided, however, That this act shall not be construed to deny the right of each House of Congress to be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, or to prohibit the admission by either House of any member duly elected and qualified, upon taking the required oath of office at any time.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, we are approaching the solution of the important and difficult problems consequent upon the suppression of armed hostilities. Such approach has not been rapid because rapidity was not desirable, but with that deliberation which the gravity of the questions demanded.

Upon new and untried issues differences of opinion even among friends having the same ultimate object in view were to be expected, and these differences it was the part of wisdom, if not of charity, to tolerate. It is only by a free and fearless discussion, by patient research and examination, by full interchange of sentiment, that truth can be separated from error, and fallacies be detected and exposed.

The war was commenced by the traitors for the purpose of destroying the Union. Patriots resisted the attack for the purpose of saving the Union. Here was a broad line of distinction which none could misconstrue or fail to comprehend. The American people divided upon this issue, and were found upon the one side or the other, as they were moved by their sympathies or influenced by the dictates of their judgment. The contest was a long one and terribly severe and desperate.

The patriots triumphed, and that triumph indubitably established the fact that this Union shall not be destroyed. Hence it follows that we are destined to live together as one people, under the same Government, with an identity of institutions, and subject to the same laws.

The war wrought radical changes in our social and political systems; and the machinery of the Government must now be thoroughly adapted to these changes before we can expect that harmony and unity so essential to our future peace and safety. This work must be performed by some one, and who shall do it, the patriots or the traitors? Who best prepared to do the work well, the men who tried to destroy the Union, or the men who succeeded in saving the Union? These questions admit of but one reply, and modesty at least would say that "traitors should take a back seat in the work of restoration."

This, then, is the work of the patriot; and in its performance he should be governed by two cardinal principles: first, that sooner or later we must live together as one people; second, that we have a right to demand and must demand irreversible guarantees for the future peace and safety of the country before we consent to restore the late rebel States to their proper practical relations in the Union.

No person may feel any special interest in what I may heretofore have said in this House, yet nearly eighteen months ago, in speaking upon these questions, I used the following language:

"I do not for a moment believe in either of the positions assumed by the respective friends of each, that secession can take any State out of the Union or that any State by such act has destroyed itself, committed suicide, as it is said, or that the rebellious district is to be considered and treated as foreign territory."

I entertain the same opinion to-day.

The local governments in the several rebel States were undoubtedly destroyed by the act of rebellion, and Congress to-day can either provide for the organization of the new local State governments or may accept those already organized under the auspices of the executive department, by virtue of its military authority. We have determined to adopt the latter course, whether wisely or not is no longer debatable. What remains to be done is for the people of the several States to ratify the constitutional amendment which was agreed to by us on yesterday, an amendment demanded by the exigency of the times as a condition precedent to the full restoration of the late rebel States. This we have the undoubted authority to do, and we shall be utterly false to all our great interests if we fail or refuse to enforce these precedent guarantees.

This amendment contains five sections, as follows, namely:

1. Secures to all persons born or naturalized in the United States the rights of American citizenship.

2. Bases representation in Congress upon the voting population of each State, thus depriving each State of political power in the same proportion as such State denies the right of suffrage to its male inhabitants.

3. Provides that a certain class, being the most intelligent and influential of the rebels, shall be deprived of the right to hold any office, State or national, on account of their participation in rebellion.

4. Declares the validity of the public debt and repudiates the debt of the so-called confederacy.

5. Empowers Congress to enforce these several provisions by appropriate legislation.

The adoption of this article shall be a condition precedent to the admission of any of the late rebel States to representation in Congress, and the future historian of our country, when reviewing the scenes through which we are passing, cannot fail to remark the extreme of mercy and leniency which characterizes the course which the victor has seen fit to adopt toward those who have been guilty of such great and aggravated crimes.

A different policy from this is urged upon our people, one which contends for the immediate and unconditional admission to seats in Congress of the so-called loyal Representatives upon their simply taking the official oaths, insisting that the suppression of the rebellion restores the rebel States to the same rights they possessed before the rebellion. This to my mind is most mischievous and suicidal, and would be a premium for treason instead of a punishment of traitors. It would increase the political power of the South to the extent of thirteen members of Congress and presidential electors, thus endangering the freedom of the former slave, the payment of our national debt, and the pensions we pay to our disabled soldiers and to the widows and orphans of the war.

A policy so detrimental to the best interests of the nation should find no supporters among those who have been struggling against treason and traitors for the last five years. The fact that it counts among its supporters the whole tribe of reconstructed as well as unpardoned rebels, together with those who sympathized with them in their hellish attempt to destroy the Government, is of itself (were there no other reason) sufficient to deter all patriots from giving it the least countenance and support. Should the Thirty-Ninth Congress have sanctioned this policy, instead of receiving the hearty support of the country, its members would in all coming time be regarded as the betrayers of public liberty.

The issue is, then, fairly and squarely presented to the American people by these respective policies for their adjudication, and resolves itself into this single question: shall those who saved the Republic or those who tried to destroy it be permitted hereafter to shape its policy and control its destiny?

With these guarantees, obtained from each of the late rebel States prior to granting them the right to assist in legislating for the country, we shall have such guards and checks as will effectually prevent the accomplishment of wrong, were it ever meditated. The best preventive of evil in every position of life is to remove the power to do evil. Having thus agreed upon the proper guarantees, our next duty is to provide such legislation as will carry them into effect.

On this subject there ought to be but little, if any, diversity of opinion. There may be some difference among us as to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] to the joint resolutions of the select committee. I shall favor the adoption of this amendment.

It provides substantially that when any one of the States recently in rebellion shall have adopted the constitutional amendment which we have submitted to the several States for ratification, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, after having taken the oaths of office required by law (including, of course, the test oath) may be admitted into Congress as such. This proposition, to my mind, is fair and reasonable, and not justly obnoxious to any serious objection.

It is feared by many that a State recently in rebellion may, after ratifying such amendment and thus obtaining representation in Congress, rescind, repeal, or annul such action before it shall have become a part of the Constitution. According to my interpretation of the Constitution, whenever the Legislature of a State has once ratified a constitutional amendment which has been submitted by Congress to the States, such action is absolute and irrevocable. The language of the Constitution on this subject is direct and explicit. A constitutional amendment, whatever it may be, is submitted for "ratification," and for ratification alone. The language is not in the alternative, "for ratification or rejection." Should the Legislature of any State reject such amendment, the legal effect of its action would be the same as if no action whatever had been taken in the premises, and the same or any subsequent Legislature of the State can proceed again to the consideration of the subject, and this the Legislature can do ad infinitum until such action results in a ratification. When once ratified, then the power of the Legislature over the subject is spent, exhausted, terminated, and cannot be reversed or recalled. The act is accomplished, and in the nature of things becomes irrevocable, because the subject has then passed beyond the further control or jurisdiction of the Legislature.

Why is this so, and whence the difference between this and an ordinary legislative act which is subject to modification, change, or repeal? For the simple reason that it is not a legislative act in any true sense of the term. In acting upon proposed constitutional amendments the Legislatures of the several States derive all their authority from the national Constitution and the action of Congress under the Constitution, and for the time being they are invested with the sovereign power of the people of their respective States. Sovereign power only can alter or amend the fundamental law of the land; that is, the people alone, acting through conventions, can under our political system change their constitutions, State or national, except where a different mode of amendment is prescribed by the instrument itself. Where a different mode is prescribed, then the body thus authorized to act assumes a sovereign capacity, but is limited in its action by the express terms of the Constitution conferring such authority; and herein it differs from a convention emanating from and representing the people for the purposes of general amendment and change of the Constitution, such convention being unlimited in its authority over the subject. In all other respects the Legislature of a State is acting under and by virtue of the powers conferred by their local constitution; but here is an exceptional case, not arising under nor conferred by a State constitution, but by virtue of a power created and conferred upon them by the national Constitution. This power is simple and direct, and must be exercised within the express terms of the grant, which is not to reject, but to ratify an amendment. A rejection eo nomine is simply a refusal to ratify, and has the same import and none other than a neglect to act at all. It will not be contended that a neglect to act at any time deprives the Legislature or its successors, however remote such secession may be, from affirmative action thereafter, and the same result follows a negative action or refusal to ratify or a so-called rejection of any proposed amendment.

Thus an amendment may be proposed to the several States in 1860, and the State of Indiana, for instance, may refuse any action until the year 1870, at which time she may refuse to ratify, and may designate such refusal by the name of rejection, still no one will contend that the Legislature for the year 1880 is at all precluded from any action in the premises. There is no action in contemplation of the national Constitution by any Legislature in this respect until such action is affirmative in its character, and results in the ratification of the amendment submitted.

Again, I have already stated that a ratification by any Legislature is in its nature irrevocable. This results from the peculiarity of our institutions in this respect. When the Constitution was formed and adopted by the Convention it was submitted to the several States then forming the Confederation, and it was provided that "the ratification of the conventions" (instead of the Legislatures) "of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same." This, then, was of the nature of a compact or agreement, and so with all amendments to the original Constitution, and binding upon each individual State when ratified by it. Let me not be misunderstood at this point. I do not contend that the ratification of a constitutional amendment by a single State makes such amendment binding upon that particular State before it shall have been ratified by the requisite number of States. Not at all. My position is, that such ratification is binding upon that State only so far as to prevent it from receding from such ratification, and not so as to compel such State to conform its legislation to such amendment until assented to by a sufficient number of States to make it obligatory as a part of the Constitution. In this respect it may be likened unto an inchoate contract between two or more individuals. A makes a proposition for the sale of property to B, giving to B a certain length of time within which he is to accept or reject the proposition. In this case A is bound by his proposition until the expiration of the time limited, and cannot withdraw the same so as to defeat his liability until B has signified his intention in reference thereto; and when B gives his assent to the proposition it becomes a perfect contract between the parties and equally obligatory upon both.

So with amendments to the Constitution, except that here there is no limitation of time within which the several States shall act affirmatively on such amendments, but this fact does not impair the validity of the compact, or lessen its binding obligation upon any State which may have ratified, for there being no limitation of time, of course time does not enter into or become of the essence of the contract. Were it otherwise no amendment could ever be adopted, or rather would be subject to the changing sentiment, the whims and caprices of the several States to an extent that would destroy all hope of any amendments ever being adopted.

The several States in the very nature of things cannot act simultaneously upon any proposed amendment; one State must almost of necessity take action before another, and thence await the action of other States. Will it be said that while thus awaiting the action of others it can reverse its own action? Suppose it be true as contended, that it requires the assent of twenty-seven of our States to give vitality to any amendment. If it be said that when twenty-six have ratified, and the twenty-seventh State is in the act of ratifying, any one or more of those twenty-six States may reverse their action, when or how can you ever hope for the adoption of any amendment? A different position from that for which I am contending is so near akin to the doctrine of the right of secession that I could not, for this reason alone, give it my assent, without the most cogent and convincing reasons, which much reflection on the subject has failed to bring to my mind.

In the examination of legal questions we always gladly avail ourselves of precedents whenever we can summon them to our aid, and although we have in this case no direct precedent on the question of the right of a State to withdraw its assent when once given, yet our constitutional history furnishes at least a strong negative pregnant against the maintenance of such right in the fact that the Constitution was not adopted simultaneously by the States, but at different periods, ranging from the 7th of December, 1787, to the 29th of May, 1790, and that during this period of nearly three years no single State attempted to withdraw the assent which it had given. The Constitution was adopted in the following order of time, namely:

Delaware.....	December 7, 1787
Pennsylvania.....	December 12, 1787
New Jersey.....	December 18, 1787
Georgia.....	January 2, 1788
Connecticut.....	January 9, 1788
Massachusetts.....	February 6, 1788
Maryland.....	April 28, 1788
South Carolina.....	May 23, 1788
New Hampshire.....	June 21, 1788
Virginia.....	June 26, 1788
New York.....	July 26, 1788
North Carolina.....	November 21, 1789
Rhode Island.....	May 29, 1790

The first ten amendments to the Constitutions were adopted by the several States in the following order of time:

New Jersey.....	November 20, 1789
Maryland.....	December 19, 1789
North Carolina.....	December 22, 1789
South Carolina.....	January 19, 1790
New Hampshire.....	January 25, 1790
Delaware.....	January 28, 1790
Pennsylvania.....	March 10, 1790
New York.....	March 27, 1790
Rhode Island.....	June 15, 1790
Vermont.....	November 3, 1791
Virginia.....	December 15, 1791

being only eleven out of the fourteen States then composing the Union.

As I have already stated, there is not a single instance on record where any State ever attempted to withdraw its assent, given to the original Constitution or to any of its amendments, and this of itself furnishes strong proof of the correctness of the position for which I am contending.

I would be one of the last members on this floor, Mr. Speaker, who would in the least jeopard the future peace and safety of this great Republic by permitting a single one of the States recently in rebellion to resume its position in the Union without first obtaining the guarantees we propose to secure and which we have a right to demand; and hence if there were any doubt upon my mind in reference to this question I should not hesitate to say that none of the late rebel States should be thus recognized until such guarantees shall have first become a part of the Constitution. We believe that these guarantees are demanded by the States who remained loyal to the Union in our recent struggle. If this be so, of which I entertain no doubt, where is the cause for apprehended danger to result from the adoption of this amendment to the pending bill? Suppose, however, that the loyal States refuse to adopt these guarantees, thus deciding in favor of a different policy of restoration, shall such refusal operate to the disadvantage of any of the late rebel States? This would be so evidently unjust that I, at least, am unwilling to advocate such a course. Shall Tennessee or Arkansas, for instance, be punished for the recusancy of Indiana or Pennsylvania? Suppose that within the next two or the next five years all of the eleven late rebel States shall see fit, in order to resume their practical relations in the Union, to adopt these constitutional amendments, it will then require only the assent of sixteen of the loyal States to make these guarantees a part of the Constitution. Are members of this House afraid to intrust this question to sixteen out of the twenty-five loyal States? For myself, I entertain no such fears; to do so would be to doubt the patriotism of the people who have made so many noble and heroic sacrifices to save the Government from destruction, and who are equally prepared to demand and enforce proper guarantees for our future peace and safety.

Mr. Speaker, I do not conceal the fact that, personally, I desired the adoption of more stringent terms and the assumption of a more elevated position than this Congress has assumed. I preferred a position more in consonance with the liberal spirit of the age in which we live, and with those true principles of freedom and humanity now rapidly spreading over the civilized globe, and which are destined to encircle it as the earth is encircled by its atmosphere. These guarantees are the result of a concession among friends having the same general object in view, and in that spirit they receive my assent. We have sent them to our people for their adoption; let us recollect that in doing so we have but taken one step, a great step, I grant you, in the right direction, and trust that the work thus auspiciously carried forward is not to stop, but to continue its onward march until wrong, injustice, and oppression shall everywhere disappear. The years numbering from 1861 to 1866 are momentous years, and will form one of the brightest epochs in the annals of our race. Those years have witnessed a struggle of unexampled proportions, and a victory without a parallel. They have witnessed the salvation of a republic whose principles and whose power will be felt in every land. They have witnessed the enfranchisement of a race who had been in bondage over two hundred years; restored not only to liberty but by our recent action placed in the possession of their civil rights, and who are daily giving evidence of their appreciation of the boon thus conferred. Our forefathers secured liberty to themselves and their posterity; we have done more—more than they, more than Grecian or Roman ever accomplished; we have given liberty to others.

Let the American people see to it that in this noble work no backward steps are taken.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 87) to provide for the payment of bounty to certain Indian regiments.

RAILROAD IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate joint resolution No. 85, explanatory of and in addition to the act of May 5, 1864, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in Wisconsin." I will state that a similar bill has been before the Committee on Public Lands and has been unanimously agreed upon. The matter is a purely local one, and the delegation from Wisconsin are agreed upon it.

The joint resolution was accordingly taken up, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNELLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DONNELLY. I now move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

ALEXIS GARDAPIER.

The first business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 308, confirming the title of Alexis Gardapier to a certain tract of land in the county of Brown, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MARGARET A. FARRAN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 368, granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret A. Farran; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

OFFICERS IN THE NAVY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 269, to define the number and regulate the appointment of officers in the Navy, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SOLDIERS' CONVENTION IN PENNSYLVANIA.

THE SPEAKER laid before the House the proceedings of a soldiers' State convention in Pennsylvania; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

VIRGINIA S. WILSON.

Mr. FARQUHAR, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Virginia S. Wilson, widow of the late Captain George W. Wilson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JOHN GORDON.

Mr. FARQUHAR, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, by unanimous consent, reported back Senate bill No. 294, for the relief of John Gordon, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Postmaster General to pay to John Gordon, messenger in the Post Office Department, for extra services performed out of office hours during the administration of Postmaster General Campbell, any sum that he may believe him entitled to, at the rate of $250 per annum.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would like some explanation of this.

Mr. FARQUHAR. It is a bill from the Senate authorizing the Postmaster General to make such increase to the pay of this messenger as in his judgment he is entitled to, not exceeding $250 per annum. The facts are that he received $750 per annum as messenger, and that he did extra service, while other parties doing the same service received $250 additional pay.

Mr. PRICE. How far back does it extend?

Mr. FARQUHAR. During the administration of Mr. Polk—four years.

Mr. PRICE. At $250 a year that will make $1,000.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Other messengers doing the same service received that pay.

Mr. PRICE. It is all wrong, going back so far.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman if messengers receive any higher pay than $750?

Mr. FARQUHAR. My information is that messengers performing at the same time this same extra service received additional pay.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Several cases have been before the Committee of Claims of messengers asking for increase of pay on the ground of having performed other service than messengers. Their pay, I understand, is $750, but in many cases they have performed the duties of clerks instead of messengers, and accordingly they have come in after having performed those duties and asked for increase of pay. Now, I wish the House to understand this fact: that there are many claims of this sort presented, going back three or four years and in some cases six or eight, and that invariably the Committee of Claims have reported adversely upon them, and for this reason, that the individual performing the duty of messenger understood that he was to receive pay as such, and was regularly paid the compensation allowed by law. Now, if we are to adopt the principle that the increase of pay is to be given four or five years after the duty has been performed, then we ought to do it in all cases, and where the Committee of Claims have reported adversely we ought to report favorably.

I know nothing about this particular case. I do not believe in singling out these particular cases. This individual, I understand, was receiving a salary as messenger, and now you propose to go back and pay him for four years' extra service at $250 a year. You make a precedent. There are fifty cases of this kind in the Post Office, Treasury, and Pension Departments.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. We established the same precedent yesterday in the case of the examiners in the Patent Office.

Mr. ALLEY. I hope this bill will be passed. I think this is a very just claim. The circumstances, I understand, are these: this man is a very worthy person. He has been the first messenger in the Post Office Department for many years, and he is an exceedingly faithful and competent man. He has performed extra services, which we consider should entitle him to an increase of pay to the amount of $250 per annum. He has done it out of office hours, at the express desire of the Postmaster General, with the understanding that he was to have extra pay. He has performed other extra service in distributing stationery for several years for which he has never charged a cent, while others, who performed the same service, have received extra pay.

This is a case of so much merit, and all the persons connected with the Department regarded it as so just, that they told him he ought to demand this extra pay, and to see to it that it was deferred no longer. He accordingly appeared before our committee, and after a hearing they were unanimously of opinion that the increased pay ought to be granted. I believe every person connected with the Department considers that he ought to receive a great deal more than he now asks, because he has not only performed the extra services for which this pay is asked, but has performed other services independent of his duties as messenger. I assure the House that according to all the testimony given this is a case of very great merit, and one that ought to receive the sanction of this House.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts when this service was rendered, and when the demand for payment was made.

Mr. ALLEY. I will state for the information of the gentleman that it was performed for several years.

Mr. BINGHAM. When was the demand for payment first made?

Mr. ALLEY. About four or five years ago, I think.

Mr. BINGHAM. When was the service rendered?

Mr. ALLEY. Some six or seven, or perhaps eight years ago, I believe. This service was rendered, and the Postmaster General was asked to allow compensation for it. He declared his willingness to do so, but he had some doubt as to his authority in the matter, and referred this claimant to Congress. Mr. Gordon went to Judge Collamer, who was at that time chairman of the Post Office Committee in the Senate, and told him all the circumstances of the case. Judge Collamer said to him, "Gordon, this is a very clear case and you ought to receive your pay—all that you demand and a great deal more. When I was Postmaster General," he said, "I paid for such extra services; and if I were now Postmaster General I should pay you for this extra service. Go to the Postmaster General and tell him that I say he ought to pay you for this extra service." Gordon said that he did not like to do that, for he is an exceedingly modest man. He never said anything to Postmaster General Blair in reference to the matter. When Judge Blair had retired from the Post Office Department, the present Postmaster General said that in view of the action of the previous Postmaster General he desired that Gordon should make his application to Congress, expressing his willingness to recommend the payment of the claim. Hence this man came before our committee and asked us to report this bill, giving as a reason why he had not insisted upon payment before that he thought the expenditures of the Government were very heavy during war times, and that as long as he could manage to live without it he would not press the demand, though he had a very large family and needed the money very much.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. ALLEY.] The bill, as I understand it from the reading at the desk, goes back as far as the Postmaster Generalship of Mr. Campbell, some sixteen years ago. Does the bill provide that this man shall receive extra pay for all the time since? The gentleman speaks as if this service had been rendered continually from that time to the present.

Mr. ALLEY. This service has been rendered for several years. I do not know exactly when it commenced; but as I understand the bill, and if I am wrong my colleague upon the committee will correct me, it leaves it to the Postmaster General to pay such sum as in his judgment shall be deemed equitable and right.

Mr. BINGHAM. For what length of time?

Mr. ALLEY. For the length of time during which the service has been performed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does anybody know how long?

Mr. ALLEY. So long as the service was performed, whether for a longer or for a shorter time. The claim is of a character which ought to be paid, and I say that the length of time is no reason why compensation should be cut off.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] yield to me a moment?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I do not wish to say anything in reference to this particular case; but I do say that because extra services have been performed by clerks or other individuals it does not necessarily follow that Congress should provide payment by special legislation. It will be recollected that formerly it was left optional with the heads of Departments to settle all claims of this kind; but at a later date Congress, by a general law, provided that no extra pay should be allowed for extra services of this kind. Why was this general law passed? Simply because it was deemed proper that each individual employed in the different Departments of the Government should be held responsible for the discharge of the duties specially devolved upon him, and that he should not be called away from his regular duties to perform service for which extra pay would afterward be demanded. This was the reason which influenced Congress in passing the general law providing that it should not be legal for the heads of Departments in any case to allow pay for these extra services. Hence arises the necessity for parties making claims of this kind to come in here and ask special legislation. There are, I doubt not, a hundred cases of this nature before different committees of Congress, cases in which it is claimed that extra compensation should be granted on account of extra services performed. It is provided by a general law that pay shall not be granted for these extra services, yet it is now proposed that by special legislation we shall annul the provisions of that general law.

Mr. ALLEY. I think my colleague is mistaken in that particular. That law does not apply to such cases as this.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. This very same question has been before our committee in some half dozen cases; and the reason given for presenting such claims to Congress was that the general law did not permit the heads of the Departments to make allowance for such extra services. The law is specific.

Mr. ALLEY. The general law provides, as I understand—and this was the opinion of Judge Collamer and the reason why he told this man to apply to the Postmaster General—that these employes in the Departments cannot be required, during their regular hours of duty, to perform other service than that pertaining to their position, and that when they perform duty outside of office hours they shall not receive extra compensation where their salary is $2,500 per annum, or more. This case does not come under that law, because the salary received by this man does not amount to $2,500 per annum. In addition to that these services were performed outside of office hours. This man has been kept on duty till a late hour, night after night, week after week, month after month—I might say year after year. He has been engaged sometimes till nine or ten o'clock in the evening; and sometimes he has been obliged to be on duty upon the Sabbath.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. With the consent of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FARQUHAR,] I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Before yielding to the gentleman I ask that the bill be again read.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana, who has reported this bill, how much money it will authorize the Postmaster General to pay to this messenger.

Mr. BINGHAM. And for what number of years?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will answer with pleasure. It will allow the Postmaster General to pay this man for the term of office of Mr. Campbell, and no longer, not exceeding the sum of $250 per year.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the bill say that?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Yes, sir; the gentleman will see that it does if he will read it carefully.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I was led into a mistake in reference to the bill by the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY,] the chairman of the committee; for he bases this claim upon the amount of labor this messenger has had to perform out of office hours during the administrations succeeding that of Postmaster General Campbell. But it now appears that what is proposed is that we shall compensate this man for extra services rendered as a messenger during the administration of Mr. Campbell. We are asked to go back, I do not know how many years—some sixteen, I am told—and pay to this messenger some $250 a year extra for labor stated to have been done out of office hours. Now, we must remember that at that time living in this city was very much cheaper than it is now; and yet many messengers are now living on the same amount of salary that was paid to this man at that time. This man could then save money out of his salary; but no man could do that now on a salary of $750 a year.

It is proposed to go back and pay him for that time this extra compensation, leaving him to receive only this regular salary during the administrations which have succeeded. I think we should not establish a precedent of this character. I venture to say the estimate of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASHBURN,] that if this be passed it will be followed by one hundred like it, is not within one twentieth of the number that will be presented. Should this case pass we will have these claims swarming here as the war claims did from all the southern States until the resolution was adopted reported by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] chairman of the Committee of Claims. I think we should refuse to pass this in order that the employes of the Government having these old claims may understand they will not receive favor at the hands of Congress.

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this claim in consequence of its merits or demerits; I do not propose to say anything about its individuality, but I do object to it on the ground of the principle which will be established if this bill be passed.

I understand this is a proposition to remunerate a party who was in office some sixteen years ago on the assumption that the services he rendered were worth more than the law provided for his salary. That is the claim. Here was a distinct contract to do work for a specified price. The work has been done and the sum has been paid, but the party claims more. Now, how many of the judges of your highest courts can come here and ask with a better grace and a stronger claim an additional sum to their salary. So when you establish this principle you open a field for pouring out the treasure of the nation to an extent the magnitude of which you do not conceive. You will not find applications limited to persons in the Post Office. They will come from the Treasury Department, from the War Department, from the Army, from the Navy, from every Department of the Government. They will show you clearly they ought to have had more than they received. Unless, therefore, you have a Treasury that has no bottom, unless you have a capacity for taxation which has no end to it, you must not establish this principle, and especially at this time, when we all know the nation is groaning under a debt of necessity, a debt that must be met, a debt that must be provided for. I am astonished there is not a more general anxiety to see that this debt is not enlarged. What has been said by a colleague of mine on the committee is true in all its length and breadth. We, of the Committee of Claims, have been certainly repudiating all claims resting on a basis like this. It is time for the House to pause—

"We must not rend our subjects from our laws,
And stick them in our will. Sixth part of each?
A trembling contribution! Why, we take,
From every tree, lop, bark, and part of the timber;
And, though we leave it with a root, thus hacked,
The air will drink the sap."

We ought to look to it that we do not enlarge our already heavy taxation. I do not speak of this claim on its individual merits, but in reference to the principle involved. It will establish a precedent which will pile up burdens upon the people needlessly. It will establish a precedent such as we ought not to establish at this time of all others.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I thought this principle should not be established yesterday. I thought so before the precedent was then established in reference to the assistant examiners in the Patent Office. I held then to the doctrine which has been so ably presented for our guidance by the gentleman from Ohio. He has uttered maxims of wisdom and justice. These assistant examiners in the Patent Office, at a salary of $1,800 for the last six years, had received every dollar of their pay, and yet they came here yesterday with a bill saying, because they had done the duty of chief examiners, they should receive additional pay, and this House indorsed their application. The very men who voted in the affirmative then are now the loudest against the establishment of any such principle in this case.

Mr. DELANO. I did not hear the remark of the gentleman, but I desire to say that I was not present when the bill to which he refers was passed yesterday.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought he was. I presume he will vote for this increase of pay. That is all the speech I wish to make.

Mr. DELANO. I am rectus in curia.
Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I beg pardon of the gentleman; it was the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to whom I intended to refer.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I beg leave to correct a statement, made inadvertently on his part, by the chairman of the committee [Mr. ALLEY] to the effect that this bill would extend further than the administration of Postmaster General Campbell. It is confined exclusively to the term of office held by him, which I understand was for four years from the 4th of March, 1853. The bill leaves it to the sound discretion of the Postmaster General whether this party during those four years was or was not entitled to pay for extra services. If the Postmaster General decides that he was entitled to pay for extra services, this bill limits the amount of such pay to $250 per annum, making at the utmost $1,000.

Now, sir, I am surprised at the course of gentlemen here. When a proposition comes before the House to award extra compensation to a day laborer, they spring to the floor as though it were a question involving the very safety of the nation. And yet, yesterday, when a bill was before the House involving, not the sum of $1,000, but giving $2,800 to each examiner of the Patent Office, these men who have served there for years, who are pensioned here in the Patent Office, and are found around these Halls exercising that influence which has not yet quite departed, these gentlemen sit silent in their seats, and I think that most of those who object to this proposition voted for that increase of pay.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would like to know to whom the gentleman refers in these remarks.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I refer to gentlemen who voted yesterday to increase the pay of examiners in the Patent Office.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I supposed the gentleman was referring to some member who had made remarks here to-day. If he refers to the vote yesterday, he does not refer to me.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I do not refer to the gentleman from Iowa if he did not vote for that proposition yesterday. If he did vote for that measure, my remarks apply to him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman put his finger upon one member who has spoken against this bill who did not vote against the measure to which he refers?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am happy to hear the suggestion of the gentleman; and in reference to those members to whom he alludes I withdraw my remarks as being inapplicable to them.

I now address my remarks to the good sense of the House; and I ask this House, which passed yesterday a bill for the benefit of these pensioned, broken-down politicians, if to-day, when a proposition comes in here for the benefit of an honest, hard-working man with ten or twelve children, who has served the Government for from twelve to fifteen years, and who has not only performed his own duties constantly and thoroughly, but has rendered also extra services, they will reject his claim? He showed the committee that he had performed his duties fully and completely for $750 a year; and he then satisfied the committee that he had performed extra services after hours and even upon the Sabbath day.

A friend near me tells me that he has fourteen children. That is a still stronger reason to induce my friend from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] to give his support to the bill.

Mr. FINCK. I have here the record of the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill yesterday, to which the gentleman from Indiana has referred, and I find both the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and my colleague, who is chairman of the Committee of Claims, [Mr. DELANO,] recorded as "not voting" on that proposition.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to state to the gentleman that yesterday I was detained from the House by business at one of the Departments until after the passage of the bill referred to.

I will only say, in addition to that, that if I had been here I should have opposed that bill, and I oppose this bill because it proposes to follow up the principle established yesterday.

Mr. FINCK. I trust the gentleman from Iowa will give me credit for having afforded him an opportunity of explaining why his vote was not recorded yesterday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly; I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. FARQUHAR. It is within my personal knowledge that the gentleman from Iowa was kept away from the House for the reason that he has stated.

But, sir, the argument which the gentleman has made against this bill falls to the ground, in view of the facts of the case.

He has argued upon the supposition that this bill provides for paying this man $250 a year for the last twenty years. He was misled by the statement of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, [Mr. ALLEY.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not expect to look over the notes of my remarks, but the gentleman will find, when he looks at the report of what I said in the Globe, that before I made objection at any length to this bill he called for the reading of the bill and stated that the gentleman from Massachusetts had misled me; and I then directed my remarks to the bill as it existed.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Several gentlemen were conversing with me at the time, but I understood the gentleman to be objecting to the bill under a misapprehension of its features.

Mr. ALLEY. Allow me a word of explanation. I have not charge of this bill, and was not aware that it was worded as it stands. I was informed by the party interested that the amount claimed would be about fifteen hundred dollars, extending over a sufficient period of time to amount to that sum.

If the bill is drawn as the gentleman suggests, I think there must be some mistake. He has charge of the bill, however, and is better informed on the subject than I am. But that was my impression.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I refer to the resolution itself, in order that there shall be no misunderstanding in regard to its construction. It provides that the Postmaster General be authorized to pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to John Gordon, a messenger in the Post Office Department, for extra services performed during the administration of Postmaster General Campbell, any sum he may believe him to be entitled to at the rate of $250 per annum.

It will be observed that this is for extra services performed out of office hours, during the administration of Postmaster General Campbell, which, as I understand it, ceased on the 4th of March, 1857. Mr. Campbell was Postmaster General under the Administration of President Pierce.

Now, sir, I desire to state, in addition, that not only did this man perform extra services out of office hours, but I have assurances from reliable sources that he acted as the officer whose duty it was to disburse the stationery during the whole of this time, for which service he has never received one dollar, while other gentlemen, occupying similar positions in other bureaus, have received $150 per annum for the disbursing of stationery.

Sir, I have said much more than I intended in regard to this question. I now submit it to the House, and demand the previous question on the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I demand the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was put, and there were—ayes 30, noes 63.

So the joint resolution was rejected.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DELANO. I was absent in my committee-room when my colleague [Mr. FINCK] called the attention of the House to the fact I did not vote yesterday on the bill in reference to the assistant examiners of the Patent Office. If I had been present I should have voted against granting them additional compensation for services rendered in years that are passed. I will only add that my record is fully made up on the principle involved, and it is not in favor of extravagance of expenditure of the public money.

HYDROGRAPHIC OFFICE—AGAIN.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported back, with an amendment, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, Senate bill No. 147, to establish a hydrographic office in the Navy Department.

The amendment was to strike out at the end of section three, the following:

And that the sum of $15,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the objects hereinbefore recited in this and the preceding sections.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to state that I was unavoidably absent day before yesterday, when the vote was taken upon the passage of the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. If I had been present I would cheerfully have voted in the affirmative.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 180) to extend to the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, of West Virginia, the provisions of the act approved July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States."

WEST VIRGINIA WAR CLAIM.

Mr. McKEE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with an amendment, Senate bill No. 230, to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and paying military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion.

The amendment was to provide for three commissioners to examine the claim of West Virginia instead of one, as provided in the original bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I ask to be excused from serving on the select committee appointed this day to investigate and report in regard to an alleged assault upon a member of this House, as I am very much engaged in service upon other committees.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Mr. THAYER to fill the vacancy.

NORTHERN KANSAS RAILROAD.

Mr. LOAN. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad Senate bill No. 145 for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas railroad and telegraph.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

JOSEPH NOCK.

Mr. McRUER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back Senate joint resolution No. 71, referring the petition and papers in the case of Joseph Nock to the Court of Claims; with a recommendation that the House pass the same.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution provides that the claim of Joseph Nock for damages arising from and occasioned by the annulment of his contract to furnish locks and keys for the use of the United States mail, and also for the use of said Nock's patents in the manufacture of mail locks subsequent to such annulment, be referred to the Court of Claims for its decision in accordance with the principles of equity and justice; provided, that said court do not render judgment for a greater sum than is named in the report of Solicitor Comstock to the United States Senate, under date of December 2, 1852.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Can the gentleman from California [Mr. McRUER] state to the House the amount named in the report of Solicitor Comstock?

Mr. McRUER. I do not recollect the precise sum, but I think it was something like twenty-five hundred dollars. This is a claim which has been before Congress since 1839. There have been various reports made upon it; some for it and some against it. The Committees of Claims of this Congress did not feel willing to decide the question, and the Senate have passed a resolution referring the case to the Court of Claims.

The joint resolution was then read the third time.

The question was taken upon the passage of the joint resolution; and upon a division there were—ayes 26, noes 23; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. McRUER and BOUTWELL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 40.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. McRUER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRIETTA O. GARDINER.

Mr. COFFROTH. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report adversely upon the petition of Henrietta O. Gardiner for a pension.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that this petition be recommitted, with instructions to the committee to report a bill for the relief of Mrs. Gardiner.

Mr. Speaker, this case is peculiar. It is an application for a pension made by the widow of an officer named Farragut Gardiner, killed in the discharge of his duty in the revenue service. This application was presented at the last Congress, was favorably reported upon by the Committee on Pensions; and a bill granting a pension to this lady was passed by this House almost unanimously. I hold in my hand letters from Admiral Farragut and Commodore Stringham, both urging the justice of the claim, and citing a precedent for the allowance of a pension in such a case. As I understand—and I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Coffroth] whether such is not the fact—the committee have in this case reported adversely upon the ground that there is no precedent for granting a pension to an officer in the revenue service.

Mr. COFFROTH. This application was by the committee referred to me as a sub-committee for examination, and I reported to them in favor of granting the pension; but I was overruled by my colleagues on the committee, who, as I understood, based their action on the ground that this officer was an officer in the revenue service.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that a short letter from Admiral Farragut, which was sent to me last year and was filed among the papers in the case, may be read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1865.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a note received from the widow of the late Lieutenant Farragut Gardiner, of the United States revenue service, who lost his life in the line of his duty while boarding a vessel off Charleston several years ago, leaving a wife and child in Portland, Maine, in most needy circumstances. As you will perceive, she has mentioned your name as one who has kindly undertaken to present her claims before Congress for relief in the shape of a pension, and calls upon me to aid her in the good work as the friend of her husband, who procured his appointment in the service.

If it is in my power to afford you any assistance in this benevolent work nothing would give me more pleasure. I understand Congress has been pleased to grant a pension under similar circumstances to the widow of an officer lost in Humboldt bay. I feel satisfied your good act in this matter will bring its own reward, as well as the thanks of your obedient servant,

D. G. FARRAGUT,

Vice Admiral United States Navy.

Hon. Mr. BLAINE.

Mr. BLAINE. This lady is in very destitute circumstances, and the pension recommended by the committee last year was a small one—seventeen dollars per month. The granting of the pension in this case cannot involve a very dangerous precedent, because cases of a similar kind must, in the very nature of things, be exceedingly rare.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman says that seventeen dollars a month is a very small pension. I will ask him what pension a wounded soldier receives.

Mr. BLAINE. When I say that this is a small pension, I mean that it is not as much as the widow of an officer of similar rank in the Army would receive.

Mr. THAYER. It is nine dollars per month more than a wounded soldier receives.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman consider this a very large pension?

Mr. THAYER. I consider it a very large pension if the case is to be made a precedent. The proposition is now made for the first time to grant pensions to a class of persons who have never been pensioned before. The letter from Admiral Farragut, which has been read, is a very kind-hearted letter, but it does not give a single reason why we should inaugurate such a precedent.

Mr. BLAINE. It mentions a case precisely in point, where an officer in the revenue service was lost in Humboldt bay, and where a pension was granted to his widow.

Mr. SPALDING. Does the gentleman expect that a pension shall be granted in the case of every officer dying in the civil service?

Mr. BLAINE. In this case the officer was killed in the line of his duty while boarding a vessel off Charleston—a very different thing from merely dying in the service.

Mr. THAYER. Can the gentleman inform me when the other case which he has cited occurred?

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot. I refer the gentleman to the letter of Admiral Farragut which has been read. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. PERHAM. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the previous question for a moment.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. PERHAM. Perhaps I ought to state, in behalf of the committee, the grounds upon which it acted in this matter. Many cases have been presented to the Committee on Invalid Pensions asking for pensions in consequence of wounds received in the civil service of the Government. We have not acted favorably on any of them. It was not thought proper that we should extend the provisions of the pension laws to those in the civil service; and the committee regard the revenue service as belonging to the civil service.

No doubt this lady is worthy, and although Admiral Farragut may have sympathy for her, as we might all have, we did not think it wise and proper to open the door for such a number of pensions as we would be likely to give to those who may have been injured or to the families of those who may have been killed in the revenue or other civil service of the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was rejected.

JOHN N. HOCKADAY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely on the petition of John N. Hockaday, praying for relief; and the same was laid upon the table.

JONATHAN W. GORDON.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 127, for the relief of Jonathan W. Gordon, late major in the eleventh regiment of infantry, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in settling the accounts of Jonathan W. Gordon, late major in the eleventh regiment of infantry, to allow him a credit of $600 on account of bounties paid enlisted men in accordance with the provisions of the act of July, 1862, but before that act went into effect.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN JOHN H. CROWELL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 278, for the relief of Captain John H. Crowell, assistant quartermaster in the United States Army, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized to allow Captain John H. Crowell, on a settlement of his accounts, a credit of $225 for so much money disbursed by him to persons in the service of the United States, in payment for such services, the vouchers for which payment were captured by the rebels and destroyed in an attack upon the camp at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, where said John H. Crowell was stationed, on the 5th day of August, 1862, if, on examining the accounts of said Crowell, the Quartermaster General shall deem said Crowell justly entitled to said credit, and shall certify his approval thereof to said accounting officers.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body insisted on its amendments to House bill No. 492, making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works heretofore commenced under authority of law, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House, and asked for a committee of conference.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

On motion of Mr. PERHAM, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of a resolution adopted by the Soldiers' and Sailors' National Union League, of Wisconsin, in favor of equalization of bounties; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EVIDENCE OF THE DEATH OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back papers in relation to the evidence of the death of officers and soldiers missing in battle; and the same, as provision was already made on the subject, were laid on the table.

EDWIN CROUSE ET AL.—AGAIN.

Mr. SHELLABARGER moved to reconsider the vote by which House joint resolution No. 100, ordering the names of First Lieutenants Edwin Crouse, Jesse W. Dungan, and Joseph Parker to be placed and borne on the muster-rolls of the Army of the United States was laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to say to my colleague that owing to an amendment in the bill in the Senate it will not cover this case. The case is the same in principle precisely as that already passed upon in the House without a division.

I desire to say one word further. Owing to the limitation of thirty days which, for politic purposes, it was thought fit to put into the original bill, these soldiers will be really excluded from its operation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There are many other cases which will not be covered by that bill, and it seems to me the committee had better report a bill which will cover all these cases. If this goes through, I am afraid the zeal of our friends will not be as great as if this were dependent upon a general bill.

Mr. ROSS. This had better go to the committee. I object.

The SPEAKER. The time for objection has passed.

Mr. HALE. Has this bill been before any committee?

The SPEAKER. It has been before the Committee on Military Affairs. It was reported back by them, and laid on the table, and then reconsidered.

Mr. HALE. I move to refer it to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to recommit it to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instruction to report a general bill covering all cases of this kind.

Mr. ROSS. I ask for a division of the question. I do not want to vote for the instructions.

The SPEAKER. A motion to recommit with instructions is not divisible.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the previous question on the motion.

Mr. ROSS. I move to recommit without instructions.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope it will not be recommitted at all.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I appeal to the gentleman from Iowa to allow me to make a statement about this case.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would rather take the vote.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. It has been before the Committee on Military Affairs and they have reported adversely upon it.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, no quorum voted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to make a suggestion, that the bill go to the committee with instructions, and with leave to report at any time.

Mr. ROSS. I object to that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will say, then, without instructions and with leave to report at any time.

Mr. ROSS. I do not object to that.

The bill was accordingly recommitted without instructions, and with leave to report at any time.

JOSEPH B. ROPER.

On motion of Mr. DELANO, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of Joseph B. Roper, for indemnity for loss of property by Indians, and the same were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WARD asked and obtained leave of absence for two weeks for his colleague, Mr. HART, and also for Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. WRIGHT for one week.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. DELANO, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported adversely upon the following cases, and they were laid upon the table:

George C. Johnson, Ohio.

Eliza T. Morehead, District of Columbia.

James Preston Beck, administrator, &c., New Mexico.

James L. Johnson, survivor, &c., New Mexico.

William Townsend, Ohio.

The City of Omaha, Nebraska.

F. M. and B. H. Bixby, New York.

Eliza Jane Chaney, Maryland.

Amzi L. Burns, Pennsylvania.
Baptist and United Brethren Churches, Tyrore, Pennsylvania.

Rufus P. Hawks, Georgia.

And then, on motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees:
By Mr. AMES: The petition of John Tilden, and others, citizens of Marshfield, Massachusetts, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and the passage of such laws as shall secure equal civil and religious rights to all loyal inhabitants, without regard to race or descent.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of J. B. Allen, late Lieutenant and quartermaster, seventy-second Pennsylvania volunteers, for relief from responsibility for certain money accounts lost during the Antietam campaign.

Also, the memorial of Henry K. Kalusowski, asking an appropriation of $2,500 to purchase and pay for a bust of General Kazimierz Pulaski, killed at Savannah during the revolutionary war, which bust was executed by the late Henry D. Saunders, of Philadelphia, at the request of the Joint Library Committee of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, as a companion to that of Kosciuszko, purchased from him by Congress.

By Mr. RAYMOND: A memorial of merchants, and others, of the city of New York, praying Congress to take steps to remove a sunken wreck which obstructs navigation at the entrance of New York harbor.

By Mr. WENTWORTH: A petition from citizens of Illinois, for a survey of the route of a canal connecting the Mississippi and Illinois rivers at La Salle.

Also, the petition of Colonel H. N. Frisbie, of New Orleans, for the improvement of levees at that city.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 16, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, no business is in order to-day except debate as in Committee of the Whole on the President's annual message, upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to give notice to the House that to-day, I think, is the last Saturday of this session which the House will be able to devote to general discussion. Therefore I trust that members will make the most of it, and be prepared to work every other day while the session lasts, which I hope will be but a short time longer.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter which I presume may be of interest to every member here, and to give notice of a resolution which I design to offer on Monday next. I will ask the Clerk to read the resolution at this time for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mileage be directed to examine and report what discrepancy, if any, there was between the amount of mileage claimed by members and the amount allowed by the Mileage Committee of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and that the Mileage Committee of this House be directed in no case to allow more mileage to any member than is claimed by him.

Mr. GRIDER. I desire to say that in my opinion this resolution would do no good, but rather embarrass the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] merely gives notice that he proposes to offer the resolution just read on Monday next.

Mr. GARFIELD. A few days ago there came from the Public Printer Executive Document No. 125, being a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a House resolution, "a statement of the amounts paid for salary and mileage to the members of the Thirty-Eighth Congress." Without troubling the House with a full examination of that document, I call attention to this fact: I find my own pay set down for the term of two years, at $3,750. That is correct, as there were nine months for which I did not receive pay as member of Congress, being an officer of the Army during that time.

I am also set down as having received mileage for two thousand seven hundred and forty miles of travel, that is allowing a trip each way for each session of Congress, or four trips in all, making the estimated distance between my place of residence and this city six hundred and eighty-five miles. The amount was so much larger than my own recollection of it that I went to the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House and procured the original letter which I sent to the Mileage Committee upon the subject last year.

The letter is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.
February, 16, 1865.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your circular of yesterday, I have the honor to say:

1. The route by which I reach this city is via Cleveland, Ohio, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, and Baltimore, Maryland.
2. The distance, as given in Appleton's Railway Guide, is, from—

	Miles.
Hiram (my residence) to Cleveland.....	41
Cleveland to Pittsburgh.....	150
Pittsburgh to Harrisburg.....	249
Harrisburg to Baltimore.....	85
Baltimore to Washington.....	40
Total.....	565

3. Distance from Hiram (my place of residence) to Cleveland, Ohio, forty-one miles.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. A. GARFIELD.

Hon. AUGUSTUS FRANK, Chairman Committee on Mileage.

Multiplying the amount I gave in that letter by four would make my total amount of miles for which I should have received mileage twenty-two hundred and sixty miles, or four hundred and eighty miles less than I am set down in this report as receiving mileage for. On the back of this letter I find this indorsement: "five hundred and sixty-five miles claimed; six hundred and eighty-five miles allowed; approved: J. W. W.," which, I believe, are the initials of the chairman of the Committee on Mileage of the Thirty-Eighth Congress. It appears, then, that I was credited with one hundred and twenty miles more of travel on each trip than I ever claimed to be entitled to receive mileage for. Members were usually paid, as every gentleman here knows, in installments of small amounts from time to time, scattered over the two years, the members keeping no account in most cases of the amounts they receive, but leaving that with the Sergeant-at-Arms and Committee on Mileage. At least such were the facts in my own case.

Several members from the West, and perhaps from other parts of the country, have been credited with more miles of travel than they claimed to have been justly entitled to receive pay for. I find that to be the case with several of my colleagues from Ohio. My colleague from the Cleveland district [Mr. SPALDING] was allowed on the books of the Sergeant-at-Arms six hundred and thirty-four miles of travel on each trip, while he claimed but five hundred and ten. And in the case of my colleague from the Dayton district, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I find six hundred and eighty-nine miles claimed by him and eight hundred and twelve miles allowed by the committee. Fortunately, in the latter case, on the last day of the session, when he [Mr. SCHENCK] went to obtain his final balance of pay, he appears to have discovered this improper allowance and required a statement of the items. He found that they had allowed him mileage for one hundred and thirteen miles per trip more than he had claimed; and indorsed on the account his refusal to receive the additional amount.

I see that these facts are as new to the members around me as they were to me when I first saw the official report from the Secretary of the Treasury. It appears that the Committee on Mileage settled upon a scale of distances without the knowledge or consent of the House or of the members whose accounts they thus changed, and in the report of the Secretary, now published to Congress and the country, many are set down as having received amounts of mileage considerably larger than they actually claimed. I have therefore given notice that on next Monday I shall ask unanimous consent to introduce the resolution which has been read at the Clerk's desk, that the Committee on Mileage may inquire how this discrepancy arises, take measures to correct it, and may in the future guard against any such injustice both to the Treasury and to members.

Mr. DAVIS. I simply desire to suggest that the difficulty may have arisen from the Committee on Mileage adding to the distance traveled by members in coming from and returning to their homes the distance traveled by them in passing between the tellers on votes in this House by a division. [Laughter.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 482) entitled "An act to incorporate the Howard Institute and Home of the District of Columbia."

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) to provide for the expenses attending the exhibition of the products of the industry of the United States at the Exposition at Paris in 1867, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 307) entitled "An act authorizing the restoration of Commander Charles Hunter to the Navy."

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 325) to give certain powers to the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 290) to incorporate the National Life and Accident Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; and

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The House resumed, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the consideration of the President's annual message; on which Mr. JULIAN was entitled to the floor.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, the conflict going on to-day between Conservatism and Radicalism is not a new one. It only presents new phases, and more decided characteristics in its progress toward a final settlement. These elements in our political life were at war long years prior to the late rebellion. After the old questions concerning trade, currency, and the public lands had ceased to be the pivots on which our national policy turned, and were only nominally in dispute, Conservatism put them on its banner, and shouted for them as the living issues of the times, while intelligent men everywhere saw that the real and sole controversy was that very question of slavery which the leaders of parties were striving so anxiously to keep out of sight. Conservatism stubbornly closed its eyes to this truth. If it ever took the form of Radicalism it was in denouncing the agitation of the subject. It believed in conciliation, and concession. It preached the gospel of compromise. Professing hostility to slavery, it paraded its readiness to yield up its convictions as a virtue. Resistance to aggression and wrong, it branded as fanaticism or wickedness, while it was ever ready to purchase peace at the cost of principle. This policy of studiously deferring to the demands of arrogance and insolence, this dominating love of peace and cowardly dread of conflict, this yielding, and yielding, and yielding to the exactions of the slave interest, naturally enough fed and pampered its spirit of rapacity, and at last armed it with the weapons of civil war. Such will be the unquestioned and unquestionable record of history; and no record could be more blasting, as it will be read in the clear light of the future. To us belongs the privilege of taking counsel from the lesson in dealing with the yet unsettled problems of the crisis.

But Radicalism assumed a directly antagonistic position. It did not believe in conciliation and compromise. It did not believe that a powerful and steadily advancing evil was to be mastered by submission to its behests, but by timely and resolute resistance. The Radicals, under whatever peculiar banner they rallied, thought it was their duty to take time by the forelock; and with prophetic ears they heard the footfalls of civil war in the distance, forewarned the country of its danger, and pointed out the way of deliverance. In the ages to come Freedom will remember and cherish them as her most precious jewels; for had they been seconded in their earnest efforts to rouse the people and to lay hold of the aggressions of slavery in their incipient stages, the black tide of southern domination which has since inundated the land might have been rolled back, and the Republic saved without the frightful surgery of war. This exalted tribute to their sagacity and their fidelity to their country will be the sure award of history; and its lesson, like that of Conservatism, commends itself to our study.

But the war at length came, and with it came the same conflict between Conservatism on the one hand and Radicalism on the other. Their antagonisms put on new shapes, but were as perfectly defined as before. The proof of this is supplied by facts so well known, and so painfully remembered by all loyal men, that I need scarcely refer to them. Conservatism, in its unexampled stupidity, denied that rebels in arms against the Government were its enemies, and declared them to be only misguided friends. The counsel it perpetually volunteered was that of great moderation and forbearance on our part in the conduct of the war. It denied that slavery caused the war, or should in any way be affected by it. It insisted that slavery and freedom were "twin sisters of the Constitution," equally sacred in its sight, and equally to be guarded and defended at all hazards. Its owlish vision failed to see that two civilizations had met in the shock of deadly conflict, and that slavery at last must perish. Even down to the very close of the contest, when the dullest minds could see the new heavens and the new earth which the rebellion had ushered in. Conservatism madly insisted on "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was." Its idolized party leaders and its great military heroes were all men who believed in the divinity of slavery, whose hearts were therefore on the side of the rebellion, and whose management of the war gave proof of it. And every man of ordinary sense and intelligence knows that just so long and so far as Conservative counsels prevailed, defeat and disaster followed in our steps, and that if these counsels had not been abjured the black flag of treason would have been unfurled over the broken columns and shattered fragments of our republican edifice. Let this also be remembered in digesting a policy for the future.

But here, again, Radicalism squarely met the issue tendered by the Conservatives. That slavery caused the war and was necessarily involved in its fortunes it accepted as a simple truism. Its theory was that the rebellion was slavery, in arms against the nation. And that to strike it was to strike treason, and to spare it was to espouse the cause of the rebels. In the very beginning of the conflict Radicalism comprehended the situation and the duty. It understood the foe, utterly scouted the idea of a "war on peace principles," and demanded the employment of all the powers of war in the accomplishment of its purpose. It understood the conflict as not simply a struggle to save the Union, but a grand and final battle for the rights of man, now and hereafter; and it believed that God would never smile upon our endeavors till we accepted it as such. Radicalism therefore demanded the repeal of all laws which had been enacted to uphold and fortify slavery. It demanded the arming of the slaves against their old tyrants. It demanded emancipation as a moral and a military necessity, and a policy of the war so broadly and systematically anti-slavery as to meet the rebel power in the full sweep of its remorseless crusade against us. Its trust was in the justice of our cause and the favor of the Almighty; and just so soon as the Government turned away from its Conservative friends and joined hands with Radicalism, our arms were crowned with victories, which followed each other till the rebel power lay prostrate at our feet.

But, Mr. Speaker, the war is over. So at least we are informed by the President; and with the glad return of peace comes once more the same issue between Conservatism and Radicalism, and more clearly marked than ever before. Conservatism, true to the logic which made it the ally and handmaid of treason all through the war, now demands the indiscriminate pardon of all the rebel leaders. It recognizes the revolted States as still in the Union, in precisely the same sense as are the loyal States, and restored to all their rights as completely as if no rebellion had happened. It opposes any constitutional amendment which shall deprive the rebels of the representation of the freedmen in Congress, who have no voice as citizens, and thus sanctions this most flagrant outrage upon justice and democratic equality, in the interest of unrepentant traitors. It opposes the protection of the millions of loyal colored people of the South through the agency of a Freedmen's Bureau, and thus hands them over to starvation, and scourgings, and torture, by their former masters. It opposes, likewise, the civil rights bill, which seeks to protect these people in their right to sue, to testify in the courts, to make contracts, and to own property. It opposes, of course, with all bitterness, the policy of giving the freedmen the ballot, which "is as just a demand as governed men ever made of governing," and should be accorded at once, both on the score of policy and justice. In short, it seeks to make void and of non-effect, for any good purpose, the sacrifice of more than three hundred thousand lives and three thousand millions of money, by its eager service of the heaven-defying villains who causelessly brought this sacrifice upon the nation.

But on all these points Radicalism takes issue. It holds that treason is a crime, and that it ought to be punished. While it does not ask for vengeance, it demands public justice against some at least of the rebel leaders. It deals with the revolted States as outside of their constitutional relations to the Union, and as incapable of restoring themselves to it except on conditions to be prescribed by Congress. It demands the immediate reduction of representation in the States of the South to the basis of actual voters, and the amendment of the Constitution for that purpose. It favors the protection of the colored people of the South, through the Freedmen's Bureau and civil rights bills, as necessary to make effective the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. And for the same reason, Radicalism, when not smitten by unnatural fear or afflicted by policy, demands the ballot as the right of every colored citizen of the rebellious States. Such have been the issues between Conservatism and Radicalism, some of which are disposed of by time; and they are all in fact side issues, save the grand and all-comprehending one of suffrage. Let this be settled in harmony with our democratic institutions and all else will be added.

And in dealing with this problem, Mr. Speaker, whose counsel shall we follow? Shall we be guided by Conservatism, which paved the way for the rebellion by its policy of concession and compromise, which would have handed the country over to the rebels when the war was upon us if its policy had been adhered to, and to-day would give to the winds the fruits of our victory? Or shall our guide be that some Radicalism which would have averted the rebellion if its counsel had been heeded, which alone saved us when war came, and now asks us to accept its inevitable logic in seeking a true basis of peace? Can a loyal man hesitate in his answer? Sir, we can neither stand still nor take any backward step. For myself, at least, I shall press right on; and my strong faith is that the loyal people of the country will not madly attempt a halt in that grand march of events through which the hand of Providence is so visibly guiding the nation to liberty and lasting peace.

Mr. Speaker, of all the questions pertaining to the late rebellion which have been so much debated, it seems to me none could be more perfectly simple and unembarrassed than that of giving the ballot to the freedmen of the South. This would be conceded at once, if it were possible to forget the institution of slavery, and the foul legacy of prejudice and hate which it has bequeathed to us all. I believe the present discussions of the subject and our gingerly reluctance to face the issue squarely, will hereafter be set down among the curiosities of American politics. Sir, what is the proposition? It is simply to extend our democratic institutions over the States recently in revolt, which have been overpowered by our arms, and are now subject to the national jurisdiction. The mass of the white people of the South, including those who have been in arms against the Government, have the ballot; and there is no pending proposition to deprive them of it. But we imagine insuperable difficulties in the way of giving it to the colored people, who constitute the majority in several States, who have been universally loyal, and have furnished a strong body of soldiery in the war for the Union. Can this, indeed, be true?

Alexander Hamilton, in the fifty-fourth number of the Federalist, speaking of the slaves, says, "It is admitted that if the laws were to restore the rights which have been taken away, the negroes could no longer be refused an equal share of representation with the other inhabitants." Most certainly he was right. Why then shirk the question? Would we do so if these colored men were white? No man will pretend it. Why not secure the ballot to the men who have been restored to their rights through the treason of their masters? "Liberty, or freedom," says Dr. Franklin, "consists in having an actual share in the appointment of those who frame the laws and who are to be the guardians of every man's life, property, and peace; for the all of one man is as dear to him as the all of another; and the poor man has an equal right, but more need, to have representatives in the Legislature than the rich one." And he goes on to say: "That they who have no voice nor vote in the electing of representatives do not enjoy liberty, but are absolutely enslaved to those who have votes, and to their representatives; for to be enslaved is to have governors whom other men have set over us, and be subject to laws made by the representatives of others, without having had representatives of our own to give consent in our behalf." This, in different words, is the doctrine of James Otis, that "taxation without representation is tyranny," and was the principle on which our revolutionary fathers planted themselves in resisting British despotism. Shall we shrink from it to-day, when just emerging from a frightful civil war, caused by our infidelity to the rights of man? Are we still to love the rebels so tenderly that we must not offend them by a policy of equal and exact justice between them and the loyal men who resisted their devilish crusade against the national life? "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." Do we still doubt these truths, thus named self-evident, after having seen them written down in fire and blood during the past four years? Men talk eloquently of the natural equality of all men and the sovereignty of the popular will. Sir, if we are not hypocrites, why not accept these principles by reducing them to practice everywhere throughout the Republic? If all men are equal in their inborn rights, every man has the right to a voice in the governing power; and that right is as natural as the right to the breath of his nostrils. It is not a privilege, but a right, and you insult republicanism and brand the great Declaration as a lie, when you dispute it. You espouse the cause of absolutism at once; for if one portion of the people, black or white, can deprive another of their rights, the whole theory of American democracy is overturned. That wise men, in Congress and out of Congress, should deal with this question as a difficult and complicated one seems incredibly strange. The very horn-book of republicanism settles it; and if the teachings of our fathers are in fact to be accepted, and the poisonous exhalations of slavery shall ever be dispelled from the minds of men, a disfranchised citizen, white or colored, innocent of crime, will become an unknown anomaly. This much I say on general principles, and wholly aside from those considerations which plead imperatively for impartial suffrage in the South, on the score of justice and gratitude to the negro, the peace and well-being of society, and the stability of the Union itself.

But our power over the subject of suffrage in the States lately in revolt is disputed; and doubts respecting it are expressed even by the joint committee of fifteen, in their elaborate and very able report just given to the public. Sir, I never hear these opinions and doubts uttered without unmingled astonishment. In the whole domain of politics and jurisprudence a proposition cannot be found more perfectly beyond dispute than that Congress can prescribe the qualifications of voters in the States that rebelled against the national authority, and have been subdued by our arms. I do not now speak of the power conferred in the clause of the Constitution making it the right and duty of Congress to guaranty a republican form of government to every State; though I believe it clearly confers upon us the authority to deal with the question of suffrage in all the States. Nor do I here refer to the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and giving Congress the power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce such abolition; though I hold it to be perfectly clear that under this clause the power over the ballot is given, since a man without it, according to the principles of radical democracy and the revolutionary authorities already referred to, is a slave—the slave of society, if not the chattel of an individual master. I waive these points, and rest the case solely on the ground of the authority of the nation to do what it pleases with rebels whose revolt became a stupendous civil war, and was crushed by the power of war. That, sir, is the impregnable ground on which I stand, and I challenge all assailants. The revolt grew in its proportions till it became a civil, territorial war. We blockaded the rebel coast; we exchanged prisoners; we conducted the conflict according to the laws of war and the law of nations. The rebels became public enemies, and by the power of our resistless hosts we conquered them. As conquered public enemies their rights were all swept away, all melted in the fervent heat of their devilish treason and war. Not a respectable jurist in the Union will dispute this proposition, for the principles of the law of nations which govern the conduct of a civil war, and define the rights of the parties to it, are precisely those which pertain to the conduct of a foreign war. If this is not the settled law of nations, settled also emphatically by the Supreme Court of the United States, then nothing is settled, and nothing is capable of settlement. The report of the reconstruction committee, already referred to, which expresses doubt as to the power in question, asserts that "within the limits prescribed by humanity the conquered rebels were at the mercy of the conquerors. That a Government thus outraged had a most perfect right to exact indemnity for the injuries done and security against the recurrence of such outrages in the future would seem too clear for dispute. What the nature of that security should be; what proof should be required of a return to allegiance; what time should elapse before a people thus demoralized should be restored in full to the enjoyment of political rights and privileges, are questions for the law-making power to decide, and that decision must depend on grave considerations of public safety and the general welfare." This language covers the whole ground contended for. The power exists, and Congress alone must determine what is demanded by "considerations of the public safety and the general welfare." The question before us to-day is one of necessity and expediency, and not of power; a question of fact, rather than a question of law.

On this question, Mr. Speaker, I think there is very little ground for disagreement among loyal men. If the colored millions of the South need any earthly good supremely, and need it soon, it is a share in the governing power. Let us not mock them by the hope of it at some time in the distant future, conditioned upon alternatives which we tender to their enemies, but grant it now, as their imperative and instant necessity. They are at this moment prostrate and helpless under the heel of their old tyrants. But for the partial succor afforded by the Freedmen's Bureau their condition would be far more deplorable than that of slavery itself. Although the civil rights bill is now the law, none of the insurgent States allow colored men to testify when white men are parties. The bill, as I learn from General Howard, is pronounced void by the jurists and courts of the South. Florida makes it a misdemeanor for colored men to carry weapons without a license to do so from a probate judge, and the punishment of the offense is whipping and the pillory. South Carolina has the same enactments; and a black man convicted of an offense who fails immediately to pay his fine is whipped. A magistrate may take colored children and apprentice them for alleged misbehavior without consulting their parents. Mississippi allows no negro living in any corporate town to lease or rent lands. Cunning legislative devices are being invented in most of the States to restore slavery in fact. Without the ballot in the hands of the freedmen, local law, reinforced by a public opinion more rampant against them than ever before, will render the civil rights bill a dead letter, and in the future, as it has been in the past, the national authority will be set at defiance. Even should the civil rights bill be enforced, it would be a palliative and not a cure, since the right to sue, to testify, to make contracts, and to own property may be lawfully enjoyed without commanding a tithe of the respect with which the ballot arms every man who wields it. This is the sure refuge and help of the freedmen, and Congress has the same power to secure it that it has to withhold it from the rebels; the same power to make suffrage impartial that it has to prescribe any other condition whatever in the reconstruction of these States.

If, as is alleged, no such power exists over the loyal States, that certainly is no reason why we should not exercise it where we have the power. With the authority unquestionably in our hands to disfranchise all the rebels, the plan reported by the joint committee leaves the ballot in their hands. With strange and lavish liberality even the leaders of the rebellion are to be clothed with this sovereign attribute. They may not hold office, but they may confer it. The pirate Semmes shall not be probate judge, but his ballot shall be counted in determining who shall fill the office, and so shall the ballots of the traitors who recently tried to make piracy honorable in Alabama. General Lee cannot be President of the United States, nor Governor of Virginia, but he can march to the polls with his unhung confederates as the equal before the law, and under the old flag, of the loyalists whose valor saved the Republic. The legions of armed traitors who fought against the nation four years, and deluged it in sorrow and blood, are all to be crowned with the honor and dignity of the ballot; and, as if to make treason respectable and loyalty odious, the colored people of the country, whose enslavement caused the war, and who furnished two hundred thousand soldiers in crushing the rebellion, are to be handed over to the unbridled hate and fury of their old masters.

One would naturally have supposed that vanquished rebels would be glad enough to escape with their lives, and that Congress, in conferring upon them the franchise, would at least atone for this unlooked-for and undeserved liberality by a policy of justice, if not of gratitude, toward the negroes, whose loyalty was never questioned, and whose strong arms helped strike down the enemies of the nation. One would have supposed that if any party must be disfranchised it would be the rebels, and that loyal men would govern the country they had saved by their valor. I am quite sure that neither the copperheads nor the rebels themselves, till they were caressed by the Executive, ever dreamed of this congressional discrimination in favor of treason. Sir, it will gladden the heart of every traitor in the Union. No loyal man can defend it with a good conscience. Its recreancy is aggravated by every fact which comes to us respecting the situation in the South. The general feeling there against the freedmen is that of intense hostility and venomous hate. The institution of slavery, through the instinct of a common interest, accorded to the negro some privileges; but now he has literally "no rights which white men are bound to respect." Sharing no longer the measure of consideration which pertained to his condition as a slave, he is regarded as a despised outcast, and treated like a dog. A feeling scarcely less intolerant is evinced toward the few loyal white men in these States, who in many localities are living in constant dread of violence and murder, and are frequently waylaid and shot. Quite recently I have received a letter from a gentleman of intelligence and worth in one of the southern States, in which he says that he and his friends and neighbors, who have been hunted in the mountains like deer all through the war because they refused to take up arms against their country, having had their houses plundered or burned, their property destroyed, and themselves reduced to beggary, are still living in constant dread of assassination; and he begs me, if possible, to procure for them from the Secretary of War transportation to the North. This is a single instance among many of the actual condition and treatment of the loyalists of the South, under the fiendish domination of the men who have been ironically styled "conquered." Sir, in heart and purpose they are less conquered than before the war. If possible they hate the Yankees, with their free schools and free institutions, more than ever. I believe their wrath is more and more a consuming fire. Down in the very depths of their souls they despise the Union, its generals, its soldiers, its statesmen, its prosperity, its peace. Upon the Freedmen's Bureau and the civil rights bill they pour out the sincerest and most heartfelt curses. Not a man has been found among them who does not defend the right of secession, and vindicate the rebel cause. They choose as their Senators and Representatives in Congress and for the highest offices in the States the most conspicuous and guilty of their unrepentant traitor chiefs. They insult the old flag and scoff at our national songs. They commemorate the deeds and honor the tombs of their grandest villains, and refuse to the loyal colored people of the South the coveted privilege of strewing flowers over the graves of our heroes who died that the Republic might live. They crown treason as the highest virtue, and elevate murder to the rank of a fine art. Their newspapers are reeking with the foulest and most atrocious sentiments, and their manifest purpose is to scatter the baleful fires of discord and hate throughout the South. Under this new "reign of terror" emigration to the South, which we hoped would regenerate it, is interdicted, while the loyal men already there are looking about them for the means of speedy escape. Such is the Eden of blessedness and beauty which has been chiefly evoked by "my policy," and such are the people in whose hands Congress proposes to leave the powers of government, while it withholds the ballot from the only people whose redeeming agency and coöperating grace can restore order, liberty, and peace.

And these people, Mr. Speaker, who have "refined upon villainy till it wants a name," whose hearts are thus impregnated with the most rancorous hate toward the freedmen, and whose ascendancy over the South is hourly extending in all directions, are expected to give the ballot to the negro, if only we provide that otherwise he shall not be counted in the basis of representation. Sir, they will do no such thing. They would see the negro in Paradise, sooner than see him with the ballot in his hands. The madness which rushed into the rebellion in the interest of negro slavery, and which to-day, instead of being tamed by suffering and trial, is fiercer than ever, will never extend justice to these people. The much-talked-of "war of races," ending in negro extermination, would be far more probable. I am certainly ready to vote, as I have done, for reducing representation in the revolted States to the basis of actual voters. No man could defend his refusal to do so; but I believe the rebels, with the President at their back, will never agree to any such amendment of the Constitution, and that with their allies in the North they will be able to defeat it. Neither with nor without such an amendment, therefore, in my judgment, is there any well-grounded hope for justice from the rebel class. The decision of the case would require years of time, since it would involve the question whether nineteen or twenty-seven States are required to amend the Constitution; and the Supreme Court could not pass upon the point till nineteen States had ratified the amendment. During all this time the freedmen would be committed to the tender mercies of their enemies instead of sharing with them at once the powers of government.

Sir, why should we decline a present duty which is as clear and as palpable as the sunlight? Why impiously propose to red-handed traitors and assassins that they may trample down the precious rights of four million helpless but loyal people, if only it shall be agreed that these downtrodden millions shall not be represented in Congress? Why offer them a proposition which, if accepted, might be as fatal to the interests of the colored race as would have been the acceptance of the offer of President Lincoln to leave that race in bondage if the rebels would lay down their arms within a stipulated time? As I have already shown, the power to do what we wish is in our hands. Congress can enact a statute securing impartial suffrage in all the insurgent States, in which civil government is totally overthrown, and over which our power is supreme. Congress can pass enabling acts, as opportunely proposed by my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] providing for the calling of State conventions in those States to form constitutions, and fixing the qualifications of voters. Congress, if it deems it expedient, can disfranchise the rebels, or any portion of them, and refuse admission to the rebellious States till they have secured impartial suffrage to their people. And finally, Congress, if constitutional amendments are necessary, can propose such as will accord with justice and the rights of man, and will therefore have the strongest pledge of their ultimate success; while, in the mean time, whatever obstacles may be thrown in our way by the accidental occupant of the White House, the great cause of loyalty and freedom will be strengthened and fortified by every honest and manly endeavor to serve it.

But it is said, Mr. Speaker, that the people are not ready for so radical a policy, and that while the reconstruction of the rebel States on a solid and enduring basis is very desirable, we must accept the necessity which compels us to regard the temper of the public feeling and the practical effects upon the harmony of the Union party which advance measures would be likely to produce.

Sir, I defend the people against this accusation against their intelligence and loyalty. My own experience is that politicians are generally, if not invariably, behind the people, and rather inclined to block up the path of popular progress than to clear the way. This was undoubtedly true during the war, and every intelligent man can recall proofs of it in abundance. The people were ready for a radical policy in the first year of the conflict, as was shown by the proclamation of General Frémont of September 2, 1861. It was hailed with nearly universal joy by the Republican masses, while every leading Democratic paper in the country warmly approved it. So intense and widespread was the feeling of enthusiastic loyalty among the people from the firing upon Fort Sumter down to the revocation of this anti-slavery order, that party lines seemed utterly forgotten, and the Democratic organization in fact ceased to exist. Copperhead Democracy was a sprout from the Executive edict which Kentucky procured in the interest of slavery; but the people, at every stage of the conflict, received with open arms and grateful hearts every earnest man who came forward, and every vigorous war measure which was proposed.

Sir, why were the Union men defeated in the fall of 1862? It was because the people feared that General McClellan carried the Government in his pocket, and had no faith in his conservative policy, which bore no good fruits. The men who failed to get back to the succeeding Congress were generally the timid men who counseled policy; while the Radicals who denounced McClellan, and preached the anti-slavery gospel boldly were successful. Why did the Unionists sweep the country in the next congressional elections? It was because of their bolder and more pronounced Radicalism. Why have our public men failed before the people in the political conflicts of the past twenty years? Not, certainly, because they outran the people in radical progress, but because the people loved courage, and felt that bolder leadership was demanded. For the truth of this I appeal to gentlemen on this floor who have made political life a profession, and who are most familiar with the history of American politics.

A servant of the people needs to have faith in the people. In dealing with a great question involving the reconstruction of Government and regeneration of society in nearly half the territory of the Republic he has no right to be "a negative expression, or an unknown quantity, in the algebra which is to work out the problem." He has no right to say that the people are not ready for a given policy, if he himself understands it, and is convinced that it is just and necessary. On the contrary, he will find it most safe to accept our democratic theory that the people are capable of understanding their affairs, and of managing them through honest and fearless representatives. What our politicians most need to-day is faith, faith in the people, faith in justice, and then to add to their faith courage. If the policy you propose is right, nothing is so safe as to trust the people; if it is crooked, a weak and shallow expedient, a truce with justice, and not a real peace, then nothing could be more unsafe than an appeal to the voice of the people, which finally will be the voice of truth.

The people, you say, are not ready for negro ballots in the insurgent States. Sir, I would be glad to have the proof of that. Since the outbreak in 1861 they seem to have been ready for whatever has come in the rapid and stirring march of events. They were ready for the war, appalling as it was, and utterly foreign to their habits and tastes. When it came, as I have shown, they were ready for radical measures in its prosecution. They were ready, or soon became ready, to arm the negroes against their masters, and to demand the complete emancipation of the millions in chains. They were ready to sacrifice the lives of more than three hundred thousand brave men to save the Republic from dismemberment and ruin. They were ready to send sorrow into millions of households, and to entail upon their children a weary burden of debt in order that freedom should bear rule in these States. They were ready, when the war was ended, to demand the just chastisement of the great national criminals who were the instigators of the desolating conflict. They were ready to sanction the policy of a Freedmen's Bureau to guard and care for the men and women made nominally free by the power of war. They were ready to pass a constitutional amendment abolishing slavery forever, and arming Congress with the power, by appropriate legislation, to make such abolition effective. They were ready to crown the negro with the honors of a soldier of the Republic, and ask him to help defend it against its assassins, and thereby to pledge themselves before God and man that he should thenceforward share all the rights enjoyed by white citizens. They were ready to say, in January last, through their Representatives in this Hall, by a vote of 116 to 54, that no man under the exclusive jurisdiction of the national Government should be deprived of the ballot on account of race or color; and they have been disappointed, I am very sure, in the long delay of like action in the Senate. And they were ready, speaking through overwhelming majorities in both Houses of Congress, and in defiance of the Executive, to indorse the civil rights bill, which lacks only one short step of reaching the ballot, and the principles of which can only be defended by a logic which necessitates the grant of it as the grandest of all civil rights, and the pledge and shield of them all.

Mr. Speaker, a people who have proved themselves ready for all this will be found ready to move steadily forward toward the complete accomplishment of their grand purpose. Most assuredly they will not turn back, nor pause in their course. Their schooling during the past five years has armed them against fear, and the man who says they are not ready for all measures required to make good to the nation the righteous ends of the war impeaches both their intelligence and their patriotism. The people are not ready! This is the cry which is daily rung out here from a chorus of voices. We ourselves are all ready, individually, for the most radical policy, if the country would sustain us. Impartial suffrage is openly indorsed as the true doctrine, which, in due season, the people will be prepared to accept. They may be ready, we are told, after the fall elections, and the hope is frequently expressed that then we shall meet the issue squarely. Almost everybody, save the most unblushing copperheads, says that negro voting in the South is the true reconstruction, and is absolutely necessary if the rebels are to vote; but the country is not ripe for it. "Personally," as Henry Clay said of the annexation of Texas, all of us "would be glad to see it," but the issue is premature.

Sir, gentlemen are themselves premature, in all such statements. The people are ready, in this battle of politics, and would gladly go to the front if they could, leaving the politicians to straggle in the rear. And if the voice of the loyal millions could be faithfully executed to-day, treason would be made infamous, traitors would be disfranchised, and the loyal men of the South, irrespective of color, would take the front seats in the work of reconstruction and government. Do you doubt this? If there is real union among Union men everywhere, upon any single point, it is in their absolute determination to make sure the fruits of their victory, through whatever measures may be found needful. Sir, remembering the past, can any man really believe the loyal masses will take fright at the spectacle of negro ballots in the regions blasted by treason? All civil government there is overthrown. The President himself has so officially declared. The governments extemporized there by himself are purely military, and so far as they have assumed to be more than that they are simply usurpations. This is also perfectly understood by the country. The work of organizing civil governments in these regions belongs to their people, subject entirely to the control and direction of Congress. This, too, has been officially admitted by the President. And now, if Congress, at this session, should pass the enabling act referred to, reported by the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, authorizing the holding of conventions to form new State governments, and prescribing the same rule of impartial suffrage as was done by this House for the District of Columbia, would the people revolt against it? Would they even be offended? Does any intelligent, fair-minded man really believe it? The restoration of civil government in the South is undeniably necessary. That Congress alone, in cooperation with the people, can do this, is equally certain. The mode of organizing civil government in regions under the national jurisdiction is perfectly familiar to the people, and well settled by long and uniform practice. Who, then, shall be alarmed, if Congress, in rightfully initiating new governments, shall secure a voice to the colored millions who constitute more than two fifths of the people, and an overwhelming majority of those who are loyal? What Union man will recoil from a policy of impartial justice? Do we still so love our "southern brethren" that we must necessarily give them the ballot, and so sympathize with their tastes and dread their ill-will that we must deny it to the freedmen? Are the people to be dealt with as idiots or madmen on this subject, and counted rational on every other? Sir, let us put away timid counsels, and face the truth like men. Let us be wise to-day. Let us have faith in the sturdy common sense and unquenchable loyalty and patriotism of the people, as becomes those who have seen them confront the greatest of trials, and never yet found them wanting. Let us not doubt, for a moment, that they will sustain us, if we ourselves have the courage which "mounteth with occasion," and will only "dare do all that may become a man." Above all, let us remember that Providential guidance which in our trials hitherto has favored us exactly in the degree we have allied our cause to justice, and withheld from us the coveted prize of success as often as we have sought it at the expense of the rights of man. That same Providential discipline will most assuredly go with us to the end, whether we bravely meet the great duties of the crisis or prove ourselves unequal to our day and our work. Nothing, therefore, is so safe, and so sure to win, as the policy which shall make this truth our guide. God give us faith in His counsels, and courage to follow them! And let us not forget that—

"The wise and active conquer difficulties,
By daring to attempt them; sloth and folly
Shiver and shrink at sight of trial and hazard,
And make the impossibility their fear."

INDIANA POLICY.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution and laws of Indiana relating to negroes and mulattoes have been so often referred to in the debates during the present session of Congress, and are so different from those of most, if not all, of the other northern States, that I, as one of the Representatives from that State, feel called upon to define more accurately than has yet been done the action of our State in regard to this race of people, and to vindicate, so far as I am able, the policy which our people have seen proper to pursue in that respect. I feel it the more incumbent on me to attempt this vindication because I favored the adoption of our constitution containing the peculiar provisions of which I propose to speak, and because of my personal participation in the legislation necessary to give full effect to these provisions.

This subject has a renewed interest to the people of our State on account of the action of the present Congress, which in many respects changes, or at least attempts to change very materially the status of the negro race everywhere in the United States, and which, if sustained by the courts and people of the country, will override all State laws and State regulations in regard to that class of persons, and practically annul all that the people of Indiana or any other State may have done to separate the white and black races within its territorial limits.

This question does not affect the State of Indiana alone, however, but involves principles important, if not vital, to the good order and well-being of all the States, and hence has become a question of national importance. It is really for this reason that I ask the indulgence of the House to-day, and enter upon the discussion of a subject to which I had hoped I never would feel called upon to recur again in public debate. In thus discussing the local affairs of my State, I shall doubtless find it necessary as incidental thereto to refer to some other matters of public interest at this time.

The present constitution of Indiana which was ratified by the people of the State at a general election in August, A. D. 1851, and which went into effect on the 1st day of the succeeding November, contains, among others, the following separate article:

"ARTICLE XIII.—Negroes and Mulattoes.

"Sec. 1. No negro or mulatto shall come into or settle in the State after the adoption of this constitution.

"Sec. 2. All contracts made with any negro or mulatto coming into the State contrary to the provisions of the foregoing section shall be void; and every person who shall employ such negro or mulatto, or otherwise encourage him to remain in the State, shall be fined in any sum not less than ten dollars nor more than $500.

"Sec. 3. All fines which may be collected for a violation of the provisions of this article, or of any law which may hereafter be passed for the purpose of carrying the same into execution, shall be set apart and appropriated for the colonization of such negroes and mulattoes and their descendants as may be in the State at the adoption of this constitution, and may be willing to emigrate.

"Sec. 4. The General Assembly shall pass laws to carry out the provisions of this article."

This article was, by order of the convention which adopted the constitution containing it, submitted to a separate vote, so that the sense of the people could be taken on it alone, and so that it might or might not become a part of that constitution, according as the people of the State might desire. On this separate vote 131,040 votes were cast. Of that number 109,976 votes were in favor of the adoption of this article and 21,064 against it, making a majority in favor of its adoption of 88,912 votes. To those who are disposed to criticize the action of our State in regard to the policy it thus inaugurated, or to regard the provision a hard and unjustifiable one, I respond that no political party, as such, was responsible for it, but that the people of the State sanctioned and ratified it by an unprecedented majority, a majority approaching very nearly unanimity.

The first Legislature of the State which assembled after this new constitution went into force enacted laws to carry this article into full effect, prescribing penalties against those who might violate its provisions, and making ample arrangements for the colonization of such negroes and mulattoes of the State as might be willing to emigrate.

As might very naturally be expected, sir, a policy so important as this was not entered upon by our State without the most thorough discussion and the maturest deliberation. The debates of the convention which adopted it fully sustain this assertion.

The first question which is presented in reviewing the action of the convention on this subject is, did it possess the power, representing the sovereign power of the State as it did, to adopt and render effective this policy of repression and exclusion as to the negro race? I insist, sir, that it did possess this power, and that the position I thus assume can be sustained both on principle and by well-established authorities. I go further, sir, and insist that this convention possessed the power, if sanctioned and sustained by the people of the State, to have adopted a similar policy of repression and exclusion as to any other class of people who might have been regarded by it as an undesirable population, or if the best interests of the State had, in the opinion of the convention, demanded such a course.

The authority of any State, acting through its organic law, to do anything it may choose to do which falls within the range of powers possessed by any sovereignty or political community, and about which it is not restrained by the Constitution of the United States, is, in my judgment, undeniable. The tenth article in the amendments to the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Now, sir, the States have delegated to Congress the power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." The Constitution of the United States also provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." The power of a State to adopt "a uniform rule of naturalization" is therefore impliedly denied to it. As I interpret the provision lastly above quoted there are certain "privileges and immunities" pertaining to "citizens in the several States" which each State is bound to respect, "but so far as mere rights of persons are concerned, the provision in question is confined to citizens of a State who are temporarily in another State without taking up their residence there. It gives them no political rights in the State, as to voting, holding office, or in any other respect." (See Howard's U. S. Reports, vol. 19, page 422.) Beyond these provisions in relation to "a uniform rule of naturalization," and the "privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States" to which the citizens of each State are entitled, I find nothing in the Constitution of the United States, either as a delegated power or as a restriction, bearing on the question of citizenship. Section ten of that instrument, in enumerating the powers denied to the several States, does not allude to the subject of citizenship at all, and denies nothing to the State in relation to it. Hence I affirm that all questions relating to State citizenship, to domicile, or residence, whether temporary or otherwise, within the States, rest with the States alone, and are among the powers reserved to the "States respectively, or to the people." If I am right in this conclusion, sir, then the power of Indiana is as ample and unrestricted over these matters as if she were an independent State, and not a member of the Federal Union.

What, therefore, may an independent State do in excluding persons from its territorial limits or in repelling persons desirous of migrating into it? In determining this question we have to look to the law of nations, to the decisions of the courts, and to those principles which underlie all legitimate Governments. Vattel, in his Treatise on the Law of Nations, (see book two, chapter seven, section ninety-four,) says:

"The sovereign [which in our form of government means the people] may forbid the entrance of his territory, either to foreigners in general, or in particular cases, or to certain persons, or for certain particular purposes, according as he may think it advantageous to the State."

Quotations of similar import might be drawn from other writers on international law, but I regard it as unnecessary to multiply them here. There is no conflict of authorities on this point that I am aware of. In the case of the City of New York vs. Miln, found in volume eleven of Peters's United States Reports, commencing on page 102, the powers of the several States of the United States over the question under discussion is very ably and very fully treated. It is a leading and well-known case of its class, and arose on the power of the State of New York to exclude or impose conditions on emigrants from foreign countries or the ports of other States arriving in vessels under certain circumstances. The court in its opinion first argued to show that there is no conflict between the law of New York and the law of Congress governing the transportation of passengers and the navigation of vessels, and intimates that on that ground, perhaps, the law of New York might be sustained. After disposing of that point, however, the court say:

"But we do not place our opinion on this ground. We choose rather to plant ourselves on what we consider impregnable positions. They are these: that a State has the undeniable and unlimited jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territorial limits as any foreign nation; where that jurisdiction is not surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States. That by virtue of this it is not only the right, but the bounden and solemn duty of a State to advance the safety, happiness, and prosperity of its people, and to provide for its general welfare by any and every act of legislation which it may deem to be conducive to those ends, where the power over the particular subject or the manner of its exercise is not surrendered or restrained in the manner just stated. That all those powers which relate merely to municipal legislation, or what may, perhaps, more properly be called internal police, are not thus surrendered or restrained; and that, consequently, in relation to these the authority of a State is complete, unqualified, and exclusive."

Further on in the same case the court say:

"We suppose it to be equally clear that a State has as much right to guard, by anticipation, against the commission of an offense against its laws as to inflict punishment upon the offender after it shall have been committed."

In a more recent case this question as to the power of a State to exclude persons from its territorial limits was again considered by the Supreme Court of the United States. It arose upon a law of the State of Massachusetts imposing certain restrictions or conditions upon the admission of emigrants arriving in vessels from other countries. The case I refer to is that of Norris vs. The City of Boston, found in Curtis's United States Reports, volume seventeen, and commencing on page 122. In this case the question as to the power of a State over the subject under discussion was not only considered, but the power of the Federal Government to control the action of the several States in the premises was also discussed. I read from the opinion of Chief Justice Taney, delivered in this cause. After reciting the history of the case, he says:

"The writ of error, however, brings up nothing for revision here but the constitutionality of the law under which this money was demanded and paid, and that question I proceed to examine."

"And the first inquiry is whether, under the Constitution of the United States, the Federal Government has the power to compel the several States to receive, and suffer to remain in association with its citizens, every person or class of persons whom it may be the policy or pleasure of the United States to admit. In my judgment this question lies at the foundation of the controversy in this case. I do not mean to say that the General Government have, by treaty or act of Congress, required the State of Massachusetts to permit the aliens in question to land. I think there is no treaty or act of Congress which can be so construed. But it is not necessary to examine that question until we have first inquired whether Congress can lawfully exercise such a power, and whether the States are bound to submit to it. For if the people of the several States of this Union reserved to themselves the power of expelling from their borders any person, or class of persons, whom it might deem dangerous to its peace or likely to produce a physical or moral evil among its citizens, then any treaty or law of Congress invading this right, and authorizing the introduction of any person or description of persons against the consent of the State, would be a usurpation of power which this court could neither recognize nor enforce. I had supposed this question not now open to dispute. It was dis-timely decided in Holmes vs. Jennison, 14 Pet., 540; in Groves vs. Slaughter, 15 Pet., 449; and in Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 15 Pet., 539.

"If these cases are to stand, the right of the State is undoubted. And it is equally clear that if it may remove from among its citizens any person or description of persons whom it regards as injurious to its welfare, it follows that it may meet them at the threshold and prevent them from entering. For it will hardly be said that the United States may permit them to enter and compel the State to receive them, and that the State may immediately afterward expel them. There could be no reason of policy or humanity for compelling the States, by the power of Congress, to imbibe the poison, and then leaving them to find a remedy for it by their own exertions and at their own expense."

"If the State has the power to determine whether the persons objected to shall remain in the State in association with its citizens, it must, as an incident inseparably connected with it, have the right to determine who shall enter. Indeed, in the case of Groves vs. Slaughter, the Mississippi constitution prohibited the entry of the objectionable persons, and the opinions of the court throughout treat the exercise of this power as being the same with that of expelling them after they have entered."

"I think it to be very clear, both on principle and the authority of adjudged cases, that the several States have a right to remove from among their people, and to prevent from entering the State, any person or class or description of persons whom it may deem dangerous or injurious to the interests and welfare of its citizens, and that the State has the exclusive right to determine, in its sound discretion, whether the danger does or does not exist, free from the control of the General Government."

These latter extracts, I concede, are taken from a dissenting opinion delivered in the cause, and as to how far they are pertinent to the points that were involved in it is a question about which there was a difference of opinion among the judges of the court in which the case was considered. I submit, however, that the views of the learned judge who delivered this dissenting opinion are amply sustained by the authorities already cited, and whether strictly pertinent to the case then under discussion or not, are undeniably correct as abstract propositions of law, and fully meet the approbation of my judgment. I could cite other authorities of like import and still further corroborating the positions I have assumed, but my time will not permit me. The authorities I have referred to I maintain fully sustain me as to the power of a State to determine who shall enter its territorial limits, and to exclude all persons whom it may regard as dangerous or injurious to its interests, for whatever cause, whether real or imaginary.

In the opinion, however, of the convention to which I have referred, and of an overwhelming majority of the people of our State at the time of the adoption of our present constitution, the power to exclude negroes and mulattoes rested on much stronger grounds than the power to exclude people of all classes of other countries and other States, which I have shown exists in all the States choosing to exercise it. The convention acted upon the theory that negroes and mulattoes were not citizens of the United States, were not parties to the political compact which formed the Constitution and Government of the United States, and were not entitled to become citizens of the United States under the then existing laws of Congress and without a radical change of policy on the part of the General Government. In this assertion I am also sustained by the debates of the convention to which I have referred. In this theory our people were then supported by the long continued and almost uniform usages and practices of the United States Government, by the opinions of many of the most eminent men in the country, and by the solemn adjudications of the courts of several of the States of the Union. I am aware that the impression prevails to a very considerable extent that no respectable court had ever recognized this theory until the opinion in the celebrated Dred Scott case was pronounced by the Supreme Court of the United States. This impression is erroneous, however, as I shall attempt to show.

In Kentucky, it had been decided in the case of Kly vs. Thompson, 3 Mar., 71, that—

"Although free persons of color are not parties to the social compact, yet they are entitled to repose under its shadow."

Again, in Aury vs. Smith, 1 Litt. Rep., 327, the court said that—

"Prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution States had a right to make citizens of any person they pleased; but as the Constitution does not authorize any but white persons to become citizens of the United States, it furnishes a presumption that none others were citizens at the time of its adoption."

In Arkansas, on the 20th of January, 1843, an act was approved entitled—

"An act to prohibit emigration, &c., of free negroes, or free persons of color, into this State."

Soon afterward a man of color was indicted, tried, and convicted for coming into that State contrary to the provisions of that act. In reviewing this case the supreme court of that State say:

"The Legislature, no doubt, intended not only this section but the entire act as a measure of police necessary to the security and well-being of the people of the State. In this view we are unable to perceive any clause or provision of either the Federal or State constitution with which it conflicts. If any, it is that clause of the former which declares that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.' Are free negroes, or free colored persons, citizens within the meaning of this clause? We think not. In recurring to the past history of the Constitution, and prior to its foundation, to that of the Confederation, it will be found that nothing beyond a kind of quasi citizenship has ever been recognized in the case of colored persons."

In Connecticut, in 1833, a law was passed, which made it penal to set up or establish any school in that State for the instruction of the African race not inhabitants of the State, or to instruct or teach in any such school or institution, or board or harbor for that purpose any such person, without the previous consent in writing of the civil authorities of the town in which such school or institution might be situated.

Prudence Crandall was prosecuted for boarding and harboring a person of color, not an inhabitant of the State, contrary to the provisions of this law. One of the points raised in the defense was, that the law was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and that the person instructed, although of the African race, was a citizen of another State, and therefore entitled to the rights and privileges of citizens in the State of Connecticut. But Chief Justice Dagget, who presided at the trial of the cause, held that persons of that description were not citizens of a State, within the meaning of the word "citizen" in the Constitution of the United States, and were not, therefore, entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in other States.

The case was carried to the supreme court of errors of that State. But it went off there on another point, and no opinion was expressed in that court on the question of negro citizenship. The rulings of Chief Justice Dagget in the case have long been quoted with approbation, however, by many of the courts of the country, and the case itself, in Indiana at least, has long been regarded as a leading one of its class. (See Crandall vs. The State, 10 Conn. Rep., 340.)

Before the assembling of our convention, similar decisions on the question of negro citizenship had been made, I believe, in Georgia and Mississippi, and perhaps other States, but I cannot now give a reference to the cases from those States.

In 1821 the late William Wirt, then Attorney General of the United States, in a case referred to him, decided that "citizens of the United States" were used in the acts of Congress in the same sense as in the Constitution; and that free persons of color were not citizens within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States. The conduct of the executive department of the Government, so far as I am advised on the question, has, with some trivial exceptions, and until a recent period, been in strict conformity with this opinion of Mr. Wirt.

Again, sir, the act of Congress passed in 1790, during the second session of the first Congress which assembled after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, providing "a uniform rule of naturalization," confines the right to become citizens "to aliens, being free white persons." A large number of those who, as members of Congress, enacted this law were members of the Convention which adopted the Constitution, and thus gave what we must in fairness concede their interpretation to that instrument as to what classes of persons were citizens, and as to who were entitled to become such under it.

In 1813 another act of Congress was passed, providing—

"That from and after the termination of the war, in which the United States are now engaged with Great Britain, it shall not be lawful to employ on board of any public or private vessels of the United States, any person or persons except citizens of the United States or persons of color, natives of the United States."

This act clearly makes a distinction between citizens of the United States and persons of color, although natives of the United States, and is certainly a very plain legislative interpretation of the Constitution, that persons of color, though born in the country, are not citizens of the United States within the legal meaning of that phrase.

These authorities, with many others of similar import which I have not the space to refer to, all preceded by many years the Dred Scott decision, and were to a greater or less extent referred to and discussed by the Indiana convention during its deliberations. Since then these authorities have been reviewed and affirmed in this Dred Scott case, and upon the question of non-citizenship of the African race announce no new doctrine. I know that that case has been and still is bitterly denounced, and that terrible words have been pronounced against the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in that cause. These have been and still are but the ebullitions of frenzied partisanship, and will perish with the passions which evoked them. Judge Taney will be revered as one of the most learned, distinguished, and incorruptible judges that has yet ever adorned the American judiciary long after most of his assailants have been forgotten. Whatever objection has been made to the opinion of the court in that case, in other respects, but few eminent lawyers have ever within my knowledge denied its correctness in so far as it decides that persons of African descent were not citizens of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution. The action of the present Congress in endeavoring to confer citizenship upon that class of people I regard as a concession of its correctness on that point.

The negro, then, not being a citizen of the United States, and hence not shielded as such by the Federal Constitution, but constituting an anomalous and quasi foreign element, domiciled in the States respectively, and whether as a slave or freeman peculiarly within the jurisdiction and under the control of the States, it irresistibly follows that each State may for itself determine whether or not such negro shall enter its territory, and if he shall be so permitted to enter, then to determine the conditions upon which he shall be allowed to remain, and to fix and define his status while he does so remain within it.

I have so far, Mr. Speaker, discussed the mere question of the power of a State in certain matters within its own territorial limits. I concede, however, that because a State or a Government may possess the power to do a particular thing, it does not at all follow that it is always either wise or just to exercise that power. How far a conceded power ought to be exercised, or whether exercised at all, is a question of policy to be determined by each State for itself from time to time as emergencies may arise. Was it good policy, therefore, for the people of Indiana to exercise the power the State possessed in regard to the negro race in the manner they did? To this I might reply that it is a domestic question alone about which no other State has any well-grounded reason to complain, and hence not a proper subject of discussion outside of the territorial limits of the State, but Congress having, as I have already stated, given a national importance to every branch of this subject, I hope I will be pardoned for attempting here a brief response to that inquiry.

The people of Indiana were from the beginning, and still are, as I have no doubt, opposed to the introduction of negroes into the State in any great number, in any capacity, and for any purpose. They resolved at the start that slavery should not exist within the State. They also early enacted laws tending to discourage the immigration of free persons of color into it. In these early times the public mind was impressed with the idea that slavery would not, probably, be a perpetual institution in the country, and that some provision would ultimately have to be made by many of the States, if not by the United States Government itself, for the free people of color, and our State being a border free State, and liable always to an influx by that class of people, the future status of the free people of color within her borders was from the first a matter in which our people felt a most lively interest. They early imbibed the idea which seemed to so generally prevail during the last generation, that a separation of the races was best for both whites and blacks, and that both humanity and good policy demanded that such a separation ought to be in every suitable way encouraged. They always protested against having our State made an asylum for the free blacks of other States, where they had from any cause become an undesirable population.

Any policy we might adopt, therefore, which prevented the people of the slave States south of us from throwing this class of people upon us we concluded would tend to induce the people of these slave States to make provision for the colonization of their colored people when any of them might be emancipated from whatever cause or whatever motives. We felt, too, that as we had not enjoyed any of the direct benefits of the institution of slavery we ought not to be subjected to the burden of providing for a defenseless population thrown upon us by the institution. Only the year before the convention assembled which adopted our present constitution, an earnest canvass had been made in our sister and adjoining State of Kentucky as to the expediency and propriety of abolishing slavery in that State. The discussions in that canvass at once brought up the question as to what should be done with the slaves thus proposed to be emancipated, and engrossed the closest attention of the people of Indiana. While the mass of our people were entirely willing to see Kentucky inaugurate a system of emancipation, and very many of them were anxious for it, we felt that she ought not to colonize any of her free blacks upon us, as had in many individual instances already been done. To put the matter at rest so far as we could, and to give notice to all concerned as to our wishes in regard to these people of color, we made the provision which I have read in regard to negroes and mulattoes a part of our constitution. Our policy as to these people therefore became a part of the organic law of our State, and as such still remains in force. Whatever other motives which may have had an influence in inducing our people to enter on this policy of repression and exclusion as to the negro race, one motive unquestionably was to endeavor by this means to strengthen the cause of colonization and that system which looked to an ultimate separation of the races in this country. Whether this scheme of separation and colonization was ever a practicable one I shall not now stop to inquire. Suffice it to say that it was one which received encouragement from some of the greatest minds which the country has produced, and which only a few years since was looked upon with more or less favor in almost every portion of the United States. It was to this end that colonization societies were formed and that so much time and means have been devoted to the cause of colonization throughout the country.

But it may be said, Mr. Speaker, that however desirable it may be in some respects to separate the races, and however practicable it may have seemed at one time, recent events have destroyed all the hopes of success which may have ever clustered around that idea. I regret to have to concede that such may be the case. In the present condition of the public mind and the present exhausted financial and physical condition of the country, I grant that separation and colonization are now practically out of the question. Some portions of the country need the labor of the freedmen. Other portions want their votes and desire them to remain as a political power. All of our surplus means are absorbed by our public debt. The negro is therefore now, to all appearances, as permanently domiciled within the United States as any of us. If he must remain among us, the great practical question in regard to him is, what shall be his position in the future, and as incidental to that, who must determine and define that position? As I have been endeavoring to show, it is contended on the one side that the General Government possesses this power and ought to exercise it. On the other side, it is insisted that this power rests with the States respectively, and ought to remain with them.

Because, however, sir, the condition and future prospects of the colored race have been greatly changed as one of the results of the civil war from which we are just emerging, it does not follow that the colonization scheme was not a humane and beneficent one. It is sufficient to say that in times now passed it was regarded by the people of Indiana as affording the best solution that could be then devised as to the future disposition of the negro race on this continent. The earnest and honest desire which was then entertained by the people of Indiana to assist in carrying it out and to make it a practical success, constitutes a sufficient defense of their policy in regard to that race of people. It is not their fault, certainly, that colonization has failed to accomplish what they so much desired of it.

The action of our State in regard to the unfortunate colored race, Mr. Speaker, can be defended, and successfully, too, as I hope to show, on other grounds than as a colonization measure merely. I refer now to the inequality and physical difference between the white and black races. I have always maintained, and certainly a very large majority of the people of Indiana have, heretofore at least, also maintained, that in the grand scale of humanity the negro race is inferior to the white race, and that anything like social or political equality between the two races is neither practicable nor desirable. Our whole system of laws in relation to the negro, from the first organization of the State to the present time, has been based on that theory. I am aware that in assuming this position now I am entering the regions of controversy, and that a different theory seems now to prevail in many sections of the country. I have not time now to go into this question in all its details, nor to answer many of the arguments urged with so much earnestness of late in favor of the equality of all men without reference to race or color. That all human beings, however low in the scale of humanity, have certain rights which ought not to be, and cannot be with impunity, disregarded, I frankly concede. That the strong ought not out of mere wantonness to tyrannize over the weak is equally evident. That the negro, in his present condition in this country, is entitled to certain civil rights wherever he may be lawfully domiciled, is as fully and freely admitted.

In Indiana all the civil rights of negroes and mulattoes, lawfully within the State, including the right to testify as witnesses, are by law fully recognized. But there is a very broad distinction between the protection of a person in his civil rights, his personal and property rights, and the conferring of political power upon him. This distinction the laws of Indiana have always carefully observed, and it is a distinction which I maintain ought to be kept steadily in view while legislating in regard to the negro race on this continent.

This distinction between civil rights and political rights, this inequality between the races, was fully considered and discussed in the Indiana convention which formed our constitution. One of the leading members of that convention, (Mr. Lockhart,) afterward a member of this House, in discussing the relations between the two races, and in referring to the negro race, said:

"If citizens in a full and constitutional sense, why were they not permitted to participate in its formation? They certainly were not. The Constitution was the work of the white race; the Government for which it provides, and of which it is the fundamental law, is in their hands and under their control; and it could not have been intended to place a different race of people in all things upon terms of equality with themselves. Indeed, if such had been the desire, its utter impracticability is too evident to admit of doubt. The two races, differing as they do in complexion, habits, conformation, and intellectual endowments, could not, nor ever will, live together upon terms of social or political equality. A higher than human power has so ordered it. A greater than human agency must change the decree."—Debates Indiana Convention, page 627.

I might give other extracts of like import showing that this alleged inequality between the races was a well-recognized fact by leading members of the convention, of all parties, and by an overwhelming majority of that body. But that I regard as an unnecessary labor here. Indeed, sir, until a very recent period, this inequality between the races was regarded as a recognized and conceded fact by nearly all the representative men of all parties and of all sections of the country. Those who insisted otherwise were but rare exceptions to the general rule. It is only a brief period since none denied more indignantly the charge of favoring the equality of the races than did most of the leaders of the party now in the majority in this House. It was treated by many of them as an insult to be resented by opprobrious words and burning epithets. In illustration of the truth of these remarks, I will quote from a speech made by Mr. Lincoln, late President of the United States, at Columbus, Ohio, in September, 1859. On the morning of the day on which he spoke, on that occasion, one of the papers of that city charged that, "in debating with Senator Douglas, during the memorable contest of last fall, Mr. Lincoln declared in favor of negro suffrage, and attempted to defend that vile conception against the Little Giant." In the commencement of his speech, Mr. Lincoln noticed this charge and complained of it. He said it was a mistake and a misrepresentation, and, to vindicate himself, proceeded to read from his previous speeches. He first read from his celebrated Ottawa speech of the preceding year, as follows:
